A Day Off. Who wouldn't take a day off. From the heavy clouds in view are training, sailing away. Down a breezy sea of blue? Who wouldn't stay and stay on? Who wouldn't be and be off? Who wouldn't be and be off? And the whole world's gone a-fishing. And he beckoning to you?

"Mustered Out"

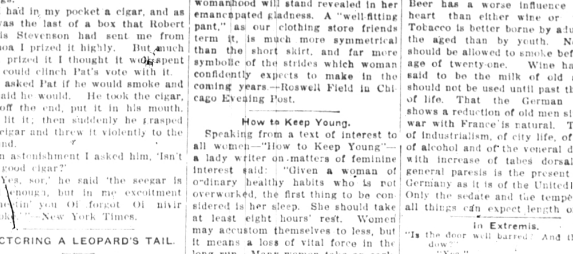

"Poor old Jim!" The three cavalry companies at Fort Couch used the words as he glared to a trooper sitting alone on the sunny side of the mess-house, gazing away over the undulating country to the Pecca Hills. Private James Bligh always called Jim except on the muster rolls but never Jim Sam for forty long years. No other man could show such a record. He had enlisted at the age of 22, and his service had continued without a break.

Forty years, most of that time spent in the frontier forts, had brought many adventures and hardships to the cavalier man. He had little to say of himself, but the written records of his regiment had done him full justice. But the day had come at last when it was "Poor old Jim!" Private Bligh had become an old man. He had not noticed it, his comrades had not seen the signs his officers had not whispered it to each other. It was only when a new colonel came to the post and set about arranging up the regiment that the word went round Jim was to be retired as too old for active service.

"It may be that I have become an old man," he said to Sergt. Dalton, as the latter tried to cheer him up, "but I hadn't realized it. No one has seen me shirk my duties on account of my years. I haven't attended sick fall in two years. When we were out after the Utes last fall I took the hardships with the best of them."

"Missy, listen to me," he said to the girl he held in his arms. "I'm an old man. I'm to be mustered out because I'm no good any more. I'm going to charge those redskins full tilt. We may die together. If they kill you and I am spared I shall carry your head to you home. If they kill me and you are spared I'll take the head of the horse which will take you safe in. Just shut your eyes and hang on. We are high upon them now—whooop—hurray!"

"Poor old Jim!" Poor old Jim!—James Nordfost in New York Press. A bald-headed man sat in the barber's chair and wearily listened to the bald-headed barber, who urged him to try a hair tonic manufactured on the premises. "We guarantee it to sprout hair on the bald spots," he babbed. "Then why don't you use it on your own?" demanded the customer.
