CHAPTER III. The burglar had passed since the foregoing. Approaching Margate road was a small sloop with a great main-sail swelling at her mast, which was stayed in the most unsightly manner.

Crystal and Pope stood together near the long tiller over which Bobbin was hanging, gazing at the scene around them. "I have been turning the matter over, Crystal," said Pope, "and I'm certain our best chance lies in bringing up off Margate and sending the boat round to Dumpton Gap to wait for us after we've landed. If this sloop comes within sight of the Hamlets she'll be sending a boat."

"You're right in knocking out of sight of that Hamlets boat," exclaimed Bobbin. "I don't know a ship of war, wear a brighter lookout's kept."

Presently the sloop was within easy pail of Margate town. Here Captain Pope barked his orders and the boat was hoisted. Pope and Crystal had talked long and earnestly. All was settled and nothing remained but to go ashore on the pier, and sail away for Hamberg.

There were three men and Captain Pope barked his orders and the boat was hoisted. Pope and Crystal had talked long and earnestly. All was settled and nothing remained but to go ashore on the pier, and sail away for Hamberg.

When the boat reached the shore he stepped on and the third man, one of them named Steve, and the other called Maddison, followed.

"I was drawing on to midnight when Pope and his men came. The boat was hoisted. Pope and Crystal had talked long and earnestly. All was settled and nothing remained but to go ashore on the pier, and sail away for Hamberg.

Pope rushed to the cupboard. It was empty. He tried the door open in a minute, and there on three shelves was arranged a quantity of handsome, massive plate, mostly of old pattern. They found tableclothes and quilts and very rapidly they made up the plate into three weighty bundles, none, however, too heavy for a stout fellow to carry with the anchor into the boat, and all in a minute, the little fabric came sailing toward that part of the sand which they had chosen for their rendezvous.

CHAPTER IV. The March to the Sea. When they left the cottage they had the leaves fast, securing it with a wedge. Not a living shape moved in any direction. "Come now," says Pope, "and let's step out into the night."

They left the man-of-warman lying dead, stretched across the narrow pathway. The figure of the running seaman had disappeared in the gloom upon the deck.

They shouldered their heavy loads and went away at a rapid trot for Dumpton Gap, which, in about ten minutes' time they turned into an deserted.

As they reared the bottom, where they might have expected to find the bow of the sands stretching into the white line of surf. It was a quarter to four.

"Yeh-eh!" shouted Pope, "and as I live, there's the boat!"

Captain Pope had no need to halt. He stepped forward, and in a moment stood upon the deck, his arms outstretched, his eyes fixed upon the boat, and his mouth open in a gasp.

"It's the boat!" he cried, "it's the boat!"

Dyins in Orchards.

It is surprising to find so large a number of orchards practically without a drop of water. To often holes are dug in the ground, and the water is drawn up by means of a pump, and the water is then used for irrigation.

Twenty-one and two-thirds acres of land are now being cultivated in the town of Southfield, Mich. The land is owned by the Southfield Land Co., and is being sold in lots of one-half acre each.

There are thousands of full grown trees in the orchards of the town of Southfield, Mich. The trees are of various kinds, including apples, pears, and cherries.

It is a very good plan for the farmer to plant a few rows of strawberries in his orchard. The strawberries will be ready for the market in the early part of the season.

A "CHIMNEY" OF BABEL.

Antwerp Village Possesses the Tallest Factory Shaft.

Hoboken, a village on the Tappan Zee, a few miles above Antwerp, and connected with it by a railway, is famous for its possession of the tallest factory shaft in the world. It is a completed shaft, and is ready to be distinguished from Antwerp, and above the distant trees. Its height is 410 feet 6 inches higher than St. Paul's cathedral. The shaft is 36 feet in diameter, and at its summit is 12 feet. The walls begin with a thickness of 9 feet, but at the top have dwindled to 4 feet. The shaft is built of brick, and is surrounded by a concrete wall. The shaft is used for the purpose of conveying the waste products of the factory to the water.

NEW METHODS IN JAPAN.

Empire of the Mikado is Now Encouraging Emigration.

In response to Russia's encroachments in Korea the Japanese government has adopted the policy of encouraging emigration. The government is offering various incentives to those who wish to emigrate, including land grants and financial assistance. The government is also providing training and education for the emigrants to help them adjust to life in their new homes.

The Cow and the Milk.

From Farmers' Review: The cow is the greatest source of contamination of the production of milk. The cow is often kept in filthy conditions, and the milk is often contaminated with bacteria. The farmers should take steps to improve the conditions of their cows and to ensure that the milk is clean and safe for consumption.
