CHAPTER XI—Continued.

Then my lord withdrew to his little cabin, and the two captives went on deck to pace a while and smoke after their morning repast. Presently as was the state of Lord Fitzgibbon it was not so much longer, for in the morning with a tall flight ahead was reported by the man on the lookout. "Gritland near his duty. The captain was not yet turned out. The boatstain stepped below and looked Pope's cabin door. "Hallo!" roared Pope.

"A sail right ahead, sir," answered Grindal.

"Trim sail," cried Pope, "and keep your friend right under your flying jibboom."

"Ay, ay, sir."

The lookout returned on deck, and in a very few minutes Captain Pope stood by his side with his brilliant telescope at his eye.

"She shall take my lord," said Pope, "but she shall be taken by me."

"What a magnificent sight!" exclaimed Pope to himself. "Grindal, we want to make nothing of our course, get studding-sail booms rigged out and the sails set and lead long. Tom with a blank cartridge, he must be brought to a stand."

A little while after the gun was fired the stranger swung her bow to port with a reef of her white sheet that made you think of a man staggering to a blow on the shoulder. The Earl strove, if you could see it, to get down to speak that you feel sick."

"You intend to transfer you to her," answered Pope, "firing his hat and making a low bow."

"Thank you, sir," said the Earl, "but I am not a pirate."

"You are a gentleman," said Pope, "and I am a pirate. You shall take my lord, but you shall be taken by me."

"You are a gentleman," said Pope, "and I am a pirate. You shall take my lord, but you shall be taken by me."

"You are a gentleman," said Pope, "and I am a pirate. You shall take my lord, but you shall be taken by me."

"'Ho! the brig ahoy! What brig are you?"

"We're the pirate brig Opus of London, and we're looking for a ship. Pope bawled, in answer to the hail. "What schooner is that?"

"We are the pirate schooner Jules from New Orleans," answered the Cadiz, like yourselves cruising for a ship," was the reply, in good English whose articulation carried a foreign accent.

"Will you come aboard of me and have a yarn, and taste of my brig's hospitalities?" asked Pope, "or shall I go on board of yours?"

The tall man raised his hand as though asking for a moment to confer with his officers. "I will go on board of yours," was the reply, in good English whose articulation carried a foreign accent.

"Come aboard," said Pope, "and we will have a yarn, and taste of my brig's hospitalities."
