CHAPTER XXIII—Continued

"You are very good to come at this hour," the owner said. "I spoke to you this evening of my dear friend from California, Miss Carden, who has come to present him. God bless you both."

"And thank you, after the weary night," said the man. "Tenderly lay Blake back on the pillows. John clasped Jessie's hands and looked in her face."

"Take her in your arms, John!" said the man.

"His voice died with a whisper, and with a long-drawn sigh, he closed his eyes."

"He's dying! Call the doctor!" exclaimed Jessie, fear and pity chasing the love light from her eyes.

"Don't send for him, I'm all right now," pleaded Blake, opening his eyes. "Let me lie here and talk to you. The sight of you two is better than all the drugs or instruments. I have something to tell you—Miss Carden."

"You promised not to talk," interposed John. "You must look at Blake which had all the effect of a command."

"Let me say just a word!" he exclaimed. "To see you two together, and to hold your hands in mine after all that has happened, gives me new courage and renewed ambition." The subdued sound of conversation came from the adjoining room. All of Blake's faculties seemed abnormally acute.

"Is not that Edith's voice?" he asked.

"She is in the other room," said John.

"Let her come in," pleaded Blake. John made a gesture of disapproval.

"I should like to see her, but you see best. I supposed John," said John. "Harkness entered the room and signaled to Blake that the interview must end. Blake gallantly raised Jessie's hands to his lips.

"Good-bye, until I better," he said, almost gaily. "You said John have your own word."

"John looked Jessie to the door, whispered a few words and returned to Blake's side.

"You're a god, John!" said Blake.

Where Racing Manners Win.

Many matters are becoming more and more important the success of harness horses that are expected to race in good company and make any part of a showing. The overexhaustion of such making a claim to get out of himself in scoring that of less speed than he himself possesses will beat him handsily before the race is under way. The driver cannot be placed at the will of his driver after the word is given with not win any race without talking about it. Neither will he be able to share it; that no matter whatever befall you—sunshine or rain, happiness or sorrow—that my ambition was to see you succeed in making a claim to our old friendship. And then you said something, Jessie—do you remember what you said, darling?"

"I told you that I loved you, Jessie," he said. The impudently made no attempt to escape. "I told you that that love was my inspiration; that I should die so making a claim to our old friendship. And then you said something, Jessie—do you remember what you said, darling?"

CHAPTER XXIV.

The End.

Peter Burt stood by the gateway and shaded his eyes with his hand as he gazed down the road. Two weeks before that day he had received his first letter from John. It briefly and modestly recited the story of his struggles and of his success, and ended with an account of the tragedy which resulted in the death of Arthur Morris and the wounding of John.

The old-fashioned clock had sounded the midday hour, and Peter Burt looked beyond the turn of the road, where the yellow poplar had dulled the green of foliage. Responding to the touch of a whip a spirited steed came galloping towards him. Sam Rounds was driving, and a stranger to Peter Burt was beside him. John Burt and Jessie were in the rear seat.

"You're very good to us, John," said Peter Burt, as he took his grandson's hand and looked into his eyes. "I have passed over his head. His stern old face grew tender as he turned to Jessie Carden.

"An old man's blessing on your pretty head, he said, gently touching the folds of her hair with his huge palm. "You are very beautiful, my child; as if it is God's will that you should be happy. As an glad to see you again, Sammy."

"I looked searchingly at the silent man in the front seat.

"I do not know you, sir," he said, extending his hand, "but any friend of my grandson's is welcome to such hospitality as a Burt can offer."

"My name is Captain Burt. My name is John's—John Hawkins, and I'm coming aboard," said the gentleman, stepping from the carriage.

"Jack Hawkins! Jack Hawkins, of the Segregated!" the dead came to life, and God is good to his servant. "Forgive me, Captain, as he has forgiven me."

"Nothing to forgive, Captain Burt!" exclaimed John Hawkins, heartily, as
