CHAPTER XXV—Continued.

"The train started on the journey which was to end in its destruction, and mile after mile sped away in silence. Once more the feeling of restraint had settled down upon us, and this time heavier than before.

"Then I remember a sudden, awful, never-to-be-forgotten crash, followed by cries and shrieks such as have rung in my ears ever since.

"I found myself flung violently forward against the opposite side of the compartment amid the smashing of woodwork, and with the presentiment of some awful doom upon me. I was half stunned, but recovering myself, found that I was not much hurt. Then I remembered my companion and turned my attention to him.

"Shall I cried, 'Are you hurt?'

"But before he could reply, another sound was added to the awful babel of cries and groans all around.

"'Fire! fire!' we heard shrieked in voices mad with terror, mingled with agonizing cries for help. The atmosphere became stifling, a sickening, insupportable odor was wafted towards us and clouds of thick, black, suffocating smoke began to drift past.

"'Silas!' I shouted, in mad terror, to my friend; 'come! exert yourself, if you wish to escape instant death!'

"And I caught him round the body and tried to compel him to move; but in vain; he only gave a scream of agony.

"'Save yourself,' he groaned. 'I cannot stir; and I think my leg is broken.'

"I was almost demented, and tore at the shattered woodwork which made his prison, with my fingers; but only to increase his agony, without freeing him from his horrible position. And already the atmosphere was like that of a furnace, and hell itself seemed to be open. I could not save him, but I might save myself. I knew the door on the other side was unlocked, so that I might attempt to escape that way.

"I have nothing to forgive," was the broken answer.

I prepared for flight, but before I had taken the first step I was stayed by my friend's voice—

"'James,' he cried—and the roaring of the flames almost drowned his voice, which was sharp and shrill with horror—'put me out of my misery. Save yourself, but shoot me through the brain first! Quick! quick!'

"It was the most merciful death, and, without pausing a second—which on that awful day might have meant a human life—I drew the revolver, placed it to his temple"—("My God!" from the reader)—"and pulled the trigger. Even as I heard the report a thin tongue of flame curled upward through the splintered flooring and, without even looking back—without even a glance at the face of my friend, I forced open the door and sprang from the now burning carriage with the smoking weapon still grasped in my right hand. In doing so I trod upon some smouldering timber and wrenched my ankle severely, so that for a long time I was lame.

"A few hours later and I was conveyed to town, together with a company of the other survivors, and as soon as I reached my destination my strength forsook me and I was prostrated for days by a nervous illness, the result of my late terrible experience.

"When I recovered, it was to find that there was a hue and cry already after me—that the partially consumed corpse of a first class passenger had been discovered shot through the head, and that all the evidence pointed to the crime having been committed by a fellow traveler who had made his escape during the terror and confusion of the catastrophe and who was being eagerly sought for.

"Since then, I have had to submit to the ordeal of seeing myself confronted by the reward of one hundred pounds offered for my detection, and have lived in daily and hourly fear of being charged with the committal of this crime—if crime it can be called—of which I was guiltless, in thought, if not in deed. It is this which is killing me, and I do not regret it.

"Sometimes I regret nothing; not even the shot which took my best friend's life and branded me with the brand of Cain!"

CHAPTER XXVI.

Dr. Jeremiah's Little Bill.

This was all. The reader drew a long, shuddering breath. "My God!" he whispered, voice and everything seeming to fall him for the moment, in the face of the revelation which had burst upon him. "My God! To think that I should know the truth at last! But how marvelous! How utterly beyond the realization of my wildest dreams!"

Not for an instant did it occur to him to think the narrative false. It was too astounding and, what was more, it agreed so exactly with all the strange, and hitherto mysterious, circumstances which had attended the tragedy. And the man he had wronged—the man he had hunted down and would have betrayed to death, believing him to be the vilest of his species—whose whole nature he had read falsely by the light of his unjust suspicions! His eyes were closed—he seemed to be hardly breathing. Had he fainted—or—was this death?

Was he to be left alone, and in the dark, with a dead or dying man?

He rushed to the door and dashed out of the house in search of a doctor.

James Ferrers was not dead; but the nearest medical man, on being summoned to the house, shook his head over the case.

"Heart!" he said, briefly. "Get him to bed. I do not think he will ever need to get up again."

By this time the whole household was roused, and the sick man's daughter was hanging in speechless grief over her father's unconscious form.

At one time it was feared that he would pass away unconscious, but the untiring application of restoratives was at last productive of some effect, and two or three hours later the dying man opened his eyes.

"I should have called much sooner," he remarked with a compassionate glance at her deep mourning, "but was afraid of intruding upon your retirement. I have a statement to make—an explanation to give, which I cannot withhold any longer."

He came nearer to her and—oh, the presumption of the creature!—actually ventured to take her hand.

"Do you remember being at the Academy, one day last June, and dropping a cartridge?"

Did she not? But she made no audible reply, and the explanation thus propitiously commenced was continued without any interruption beyond an occasional stifled exclamation on the part of its recipient.

It is not necessary, however, to report the whole of what passed during the interview. A certain portion only of it need be referred to as being of some interest.

"And you really mean to say," said Miss Ferrers to the young man, "you really mean to say that you fell in love with me then and there, and took the situation, and put up with everything, just for the sake of being under the same roof with me?"

He looked at her strangely for a moment before answering.

"What other reason could there have been?" he asked.

She clapped her hands together in delight.

"Whatever will the girls at school say to this?"

(The End.)

Beecher's Deacon Went to Sleep.

Pew sleepers are one of the burdens of a minister's life, said Rev. Robert Collyer, the veteran New York minister. "I can speak feelingly from experience. On one occasion when Henry Ward Beecher asked me to go to Plymouth Church to talk to his people, he prepared me jokingly, for he hoped that most of them were hard workers and who needed plenty of rest on Sunday, and to felt that a sermon from me might gracefully be received.

"In the course of my talk, I mentioned this, and said that it was, however, a matter upon which my feelings could not be hurt, and that I owed this imperviousness to Mr. Beecher himself. I told them that, one Sunday, years before, when I was attending a service at Plymouth, and Mr. Beecher was thundering forth, I saw one of his deacons asleep in a front pew.

"I went on to say that always after this, whenever I saw a man slumbering peacefully through my inspiring efforts in the pulpit, I would say to myself: 'Well, let him sleep; even the great Beecher can't keep 'em all awake.'"—Success.

Why He Wanted a Bible.

On McKinley's birthday President Roosevelt, the cabinet officers, and all the Washington officials wore pink carnations. The memory of McKinley was in many minds, and many were the McKinley anecdotes that were pensively told.

Congressman Dick of Akron said:

"McKinley was always good to the poor. When he lived in Canton he had each winter a great stock of blankets, shoes, potatoes, Bibles, and so forth that he would distribute where they were needed most.

"One day he gave a Bible to a newsboy. He would not have ventured upon such a gift as this had not the newsboy asked for the book.

"'I am glad,' Mr. McKinley said to the lad, 'that you want a Bible. Are you not happy now that you have gotten one?'

"'Yes, sir,' said the boy. 'I know a place where I can trade it off for a fiddle.'"—Buffalo Enquirer.

An Ideal Nursery.

In an ideal nursery, planned by a mother who devotes herself to her children, is a fireplace which is beautiful, and a favorite trysting spot of the little people.

The tiles in this unique fireplace have a white background, with delft blue figures of nursery characters, with the rhyme beside it. All the old favorites are there, including "Simple Simon." "The Old Woman in the Shoe," "Mistress Mary" and "Little Boy Blue."

Another clever nursery idea is that of the Kilkenny cats, which are of wood, cut in the outline of animals and painted to imitate them. They are joined together by a rush seat and placed on rockers to look like the old-fashioned rocking horse.

The Vogue of Pantalets.

Pantalets came into vogue about 1820. They were loose, flapping frills tied on under the knee and hanging over the foot. The strings generally broke or slipped down, and one learns of a young mother's trials with those horrid things in a letter quoted by Mrs. Earle, which says: "My finest dimity pair, with real Swiss lace, is quite useless to me, for I lost off one leg. I saw that mean Mrs. Spring wearing it last week for a tucker. My help says she won't stay if she has to wash more than seven pairs a week for Myrtilla."

TYPES OF JAPANESE

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE SUBJECTS OF THE MIKADO.

Eastern People Hold to Beliefs Which in Our Western Eyes Are Ludicrous —Tokio a City Which Will Repay the Visit of the Tourist.

(Special Correspondence.)

Almost everything in Japan is small —the people, their houses, the children, the jinrikishas. On every specimen of Japanese art, one time or another, you will find portrayed their noble mountain, Fujiyama, which is not small. To the people of Japan this mountain is sacred.

Approached for the first time, the glimpse of the mountain is a breath-catching experience. It is a volcanic mountain, trailing after its last eruption, in 1707, a fiery pace in the history of the country. The ascent of Fuji necessitates a long, hard climb through lava ashes and loose stones. Provided you have plenty of the wind on certain portions of the mountain and many are the tales told by climbers of the dangers.

Seen from level ground, the mountain is a picture of beauty. Some to be remembered. There stands apparently a few miles from the sea to chill him—sky, a perfect pyramid, sheer-crested. From dawn to sunset the silver crest constantly changes color with the most enchanting effect. At the base of the mountain more than 10,000 pilgrims gather in the autumn annually, reverently making the slow ascent of the mountain. Resthouses have been built at intervals along the upward paths and upon the summit there are several entrances to the crater, which is five feet in diameter, the entrance marked by sacred gateways.

Sculptured effigies of prostrating devotees are everywhere. Around the base of these figures are heaps of pebbles contributed by pilgrims during the journey, entwined and placed there as offerings to the gods. Numerous shrines of stone and wood, especially about the summit of the Buddhist god, who has compassion for, especially award travellers and little children. So we notice images of Jizo in many places. The Japanese love and revere new children.

This custom of piling stones to the gods of especial guardianship over children had a curious beginning. There is a legend which tells of a children living upon the banks of a river in the lower world who reaches little pebbles from the river bed and piles them there for him at the eternal task of piling up stones upon the shore. Every pebble laid at the feet of these guardian gods is supposed to lighten the burden of some child in purgatory.

The first impression of Tokio is of its enormous size. And it must be, to enclose a population of much over 1,200,000 people. From an elevation Tokio presents a plain of wooden roofs, a limitless expanse meeting the sea on one side and stretching away into gray haze on the other. On an day, when our wondering eyes could not reconcile our minds to people living in these fantastic places.

One of the peculiarities of Japanese architecture is an unusual type of gateway or portal. Sometimes it rises before you in granite, or wood, or bronze, marking the approach to a temple, or shrine, or a gentleman's residence. There are two theories of the origin of these portals. The first declares they were intended originally for perches, upon which the birds always prominent in Japan, might pause before they took their heavenward flight to bear aloft the prayers of their liberators. The second theory affirms that these straight columns with their curving crossplieces, are forms of the Chinese letter which signifies heaven.

Passing under these arches, toward the temple, the avenue will frequently be lined on either side with rows of lanterns, as the people call them. They look to us like monuments. Most of them are of stone; some of beautifully decorated bronze; many bear the crests of the family by whom they are placed. On festival days lanterns are hung, within the little monuments which are about five feet high, in honor of the dead to whom the monument was raised.

Tokio contains the beautiful Ueno Park, where the cherry blossoms abound. Poets have sung the praises of the pink cherry blossoms of Japan; even the Japanese screen and vase grows cherry blossoms. The blooming time is a national festival. Some of the avenues to the Mikado's capital are lined with the magnificent old trees, famous for beautiful coloring. In April the gala-company of Tokio an immense daily throng—men of the color as the trees but one mass of the city are solid, on which are indicated the pinkest groves of cherry trees.

One fairylike stream winds its way for two miles through banks of pink blooms, and pleasure-boats float leisurely along it. Along the banks thousands of spectators wander on foot or in jinrikishas.

After the cherry blossoms have departed comes in May the wisteria and the lovely vine covers bridges and houses and arbors bearing clusters of blossoms of indescribable purple.

In August comes the lotus flower in all its glory. The ancient writings say: "Buddha shall be born in a flower, if thou have faith in his word." The lotus growing in the stream. Accordingly the lotus with its feet in the mud and ooze and bearing aloft to heaven its pure white blossoms, is the Buddhist symbol of faith. Bronze vases usually stand on altars filled with the beautiful flowers. And the statue of Buddha has invariably for its base a smooth lotus flower in stone or bronze.

One of the most renowned places of resort for natives and tourists in Japan alike is Nikko. The mere approach to the sacred city is astonishing, over a road twenty miles in length, lined with the wonderful Japanese cedar trees, towering to the height of 200 feet. Here is the foaming river of Nikko, spanned by the famous bridge which none but the Emperor may cross. When Gen. Grant visited Japan, the Mikado paid him the very unusual compliment of ordering this bridge thrown open for his passing. But Gen. Grant, with tact and thoughtfulness for the beliefs of these people, declined the honor and took the frequented path.

From Nikko the forest path leads up the sacred mountain.

The uses by the people of the native bamboo is ingenious. The plant grows luxuriantly everywhere throughout the country, especially in the groves of Kioto. Bridges are made of bamboo, water pipes and sewers, furniture, umbrellas, baskets, hats, fans, pipe stems and walking sticks. Indeed, the list would fill many a long
