

I fear my country's glory... I fear my country's pride...

OVER THE BORDER

By J. A. TERRY

(Copyright, 1925, by Daily Staff Pub. Co.)

"Agent?" "Mr. Fremont! You—here?" "Where should I be but by your side?"

"Only the right of a love that will not down—that knows no rest or peace but in your presence."

"I cannot speak of aught beside. Agnes—" "Mrs. Marshall, you must call me."

"It is an honorable name. It is more than you ever offered to me, Mr. Fremont."

"You know I could not—then." "Yet you were not compelled to offer me—the other."

"That is two years ago—great heaven! It seems twenty years since last I saw you. I was young and wild. I loved you."

"I love you as you can never be loved by another."

"And you again offer dishonor?" "As the world counts it—perhaps."

"But what a difference—what a difference—between you and the young life of the past."

"I have seen you in the past, but you are not the same."

OLD BOSTON TOLLHOUSE SOLD

One of Many Relics of Bygone Days... The tollhouse was built in 1793.

The house had been in disuse since it left the time of its demolition one might readily believe that no repairs had been made upon it since that time.

It is good to strive against wind and rain. The horse shakes not the drops from his mane.

What time the winds on their bright wings And all the temptat friends with cheer.

Lifeless clay. The foolish dream of a selfish man. He had no right to tie your life to his declining age.

"Oh, don't say that, my husband dear! Indeed—indeed, I love you!"

Presently the arms relaxed their clasp, the old man held drooped with his head and heavy eyes.

He had gone over the border. He was free, and happy.

"I cannot go with you," she said. "My husband died an hour ago."

French Care of Children. I read in such a newspaper question as the French theory with regard to the limitation of the population.

His Good Resolution. The missionary gazed pityingly through the bars at the convict in his striped suit.

At Last He Understood. At the first moment the man failed to understand a little note received from his wife which was written in a scribbly business style.
