Edna came down the path eyeing me rather nervously. "We're not engaged," I demanded. "My note told you," she said. "Very gracious of you to grant me this interview," I concurred with her ceremoniously.

"Edna," I entreated desperately, "I have to throw these things up at you, as it were." "Don't spare me," she retorted, rather cruelly, I thought.

"I congratulate you," said Edna, slowly. "This does go right to my heart, and I effect this would have on me, but I concealed my emotions as a course of policy."

When the town of Brunswick, Me., celebrated the centennial of its incorporation, there was a big dinner, and "Tom" Reed and Nelson Dingley were present.

Gen. Jackson Vine. The wild grape vine on the shores of Daphne, Va., about one mile north of the "Gen. Jackson vine," from the fact that the Gen. Andrew Jackson twice campaigned in the neighborhood of this vine.

His Custody Luck. Mr. Makinbraks, burning with that red to be kind and helpful to his fellow men, always so characteristic of him, had taken a walk on the beach.

Great Biologist Possessed of Unknown Wealth of Tenderness. Huxley, after steadfast waiting and long and arduous search, came at last to the place where he felt he could find his home for Miss Hearn.

Blood-Curdling Cry for Beans. A wild man who recently terrorized the residents of Moultrie, Fla., and who was described as "a tall, apelike creature, hideous, with long, bristly hair and living forth with blood-curdling cries," proved to be, when captured, a Boston simple life enthusiast.

Contributors Honored. "We announce the decease of the new magazine," says an editor—"also our ability to pay its contributors, but, in recognition of their services, we have made honorary pall-bearers of all of them, and will give a funeral dinner, at which we hope to see them all."
