MISS NONY CROKER. (From a painting by Sir Thomas Lawrence, purchased last year by J. Pierpont Morgan.)

Lady Barrow, who died at East Moseley, England, Jan. 10, at the age of 97, was famous from the moment the portrait of her by Sir Thomas Lawrence was exhibited at the Royal Academy eight years ago. She was then Miss Nony Croker, the girl who in 1794, called her "the English beauty," and as such she was known for years.

LONG LIFE OF FAMOUS BEAUTY. PRESENT CONDITION OF JAPAN.

Lady Barrow, Once Tost of English Court, Dies, Aged 97. Baron Shibuzawa Sees Nothing to Desolve in the Outlook.

The toast of eighty years ago, the beauty of a court which has long since crumbled to dust, Rosamond, Lady Barrow, at the age of 97, has just closed her eyes upon the world. She was the adopted daughter of the first moment of her triumph, says a London dispatch.

The original of Sir Thomas Lawrence's "Miss Nony Croker," now in the possession of J. Pierpont Morgan, died at her London home, Jan. 10. She had barely passed her name. The adulation showered upon her, the homage of King William IV, who called her "the English beauty," and as such she was known for years.

Nony Croker was the daughter of William Fennell, at one time consul general to Brazil. She was born in Ireland and was the only child of parents whose responsibilities were far too great for their income. When she was a child, her father was a member of the House of Commons, and she was the daughter of a member of the House of Commons.

Five years later, at the age of 23, she was married to Sir George Barrow, an Irish nobleman and politician, and she bore him eight children. Lady Barrow was the friend and associate of the great people of the day, and she was the friend and associate of the great people of the day.

Christmas in the Army. Revelations sometimes go by contrast. Christmas being a season of abundance and good cheer, of happy greetings and the exchange of tokens of affection, I am reminded of the Christmas of 1863 of a cheerless, anxious Christmas of hardship, beans and butter, and a Union Army.
