

WIFE'S SUCCESS KILLED LOVE

Dissensions, Misery and Divorce the Result of Husband's Wounded Egotism.

Average Man Must Be the Bread-Winner and the King of the Domestic Structure Is in Danger of Collapse—The Case of Burr Nichols and His Gifted Wife.

Shattered Romance of Two Artists Seems to Prove That a Woman Must Beware of Becoming More Famous Than Her Husband, in His Chosen Line of Work.

Jealousy, dissensions, misery and divorce. Are these the inevitable consequences when a wife is engaged in the same line of occupation as her husband when their lives move on parallel lines and with parallel ambitions, and when it is possible that the work of the wife exceeds in merit that of the husband?

So it would seem from the unhappy marital history of Mrs. Rhoda Holmes Nichols, a painter, in which art and glory crept in at the door while love flew out through the window.

Her divorce has been recorded in the New York supreme court.

It is not an altogether unusual thing nowadays for a wife to outdo her husband in his chosen occupation. In almost every instance where this occurs misery is the consequence.

Men do not like to have wives smarter than themselves, or more ar-artist colony around Fifty-seventh street and Eighth avenue. She was pretty and popular and good.

Miss Holmes was not only a painter, but even after she began to sell her pictures she continued to be an enthusiastic student.

She went to France and Italy, where she studied art in the best schools. She was successful there, and eventually went to South Africa and Asia for landscapes.

Still heartless and winning her own way in the world, she settled down in Florence, where the air is the very breath of art, and where the sky is as tender as the eyes of love.

Here in the course of her work she met a young painter named Burr Nichols. His too was a fine artist, and their mutual tastes drew them much together.

It is strange that the very traits and characteristics and the mutual likes which give birth to love should in the end be the means of its death and funeral. The young artist and the young woman, the two of those things, how could the art from which love sprang be its murderer? Neither did they seek of the future when they became engaged. Was there not the magic of love in their embraces? Were they not, both young enough to face the future with light hearts? Could they not paint the fearful eyes away from the face of sorrow, and put the sun and bells on the picture of poverty? On these fundamental beliefs they were married.

Nichols, like his wife, was a fine painter. They lived an ideal life, their studio. They painted together, talked together, planned together, lived and dreamed for each other.

The Nichols artist family was in-spoken and the Paris Salon was sought. The picture had secured "honorable mention."

The husband resolved to paint one picture for the following year's Salon. The wife would try, too, she said. Was not her husband's success her own? If she should succeed, would not her success be gracious in the eyes of her husband and master?

Mr. Nichols smilingly gave his assent to the plan and they set to work with light hearts. Mrs. Nichols could only paint during the intervals of caring for her children, but she went to the work with a light heart, looking against hope for success.

FIND HAPPINESS IN COOPERATION

Up to this time not a cloud had marred their domestic sky. They were happy, with the endless happiness of children. They had a joy-a-pleasure in life.

And so they played together until the paintings were finished. In order to insure separate recognition they were packed and shipped in separate boxes to the Paris Salon, where all the world's artists in the world were to be seen.

Mr. Burr Nichols received their respective verdicts.

For Mrs. Rhoda Holmes it was "Painting accepted and given honorable mention."

For Mr. Burr Nichols it was "Painting judged unworthy; hereby rejected."

IS BETTER FIELD.

While they were prosperous and contented in Florence they at last decided that they could better themselves in this country.

They came accordingly and settled down in the studio district in New York. They continued their successful career, disposing of their pictures as fast as they could paint them. They were happier than most married people. They made friendly criticisms of each other's work, adopted each other's suggestions, were forgiving and forgiving, as men and wives should be.

In 1897 Mr. Nichols began a picture which, as it developed and the inspirations took wings within him, he resolved to send to the Paris Salon. As the idea grew his work became more palatial. Should he succeed, the added incentive as well as the pres-surface of the earth. But it is also true that enough is now known of the motions of the earth, moon and planets to serve every demand that is made by commerce. An observation once or twice a year, perhaps, and a few computations will be all that the business man can use commercially. But there are few who consider the large sums spent in astronomical research as wasteful, because they add so largely to the knowledge that man has about his surroundings.

In the same way, most intelligent men do not begrudge the cost in time and human life that the search for the pole demands. The most of the disagreement and discussion on this subject is about the way to accomplish it, and on this point there seem to be nearly as many opinions as there are individuals.

Search for Pole Unprofitable

By JOHN RITCHIE, JR., of Boston Scientific Society.

From the commercial standpoint it is difficult to see any cash value to the discovery of a pole, the north pole, for example. The route through the frozen seas from Nova Zemba to Greenland, from two to three months, from two to three years to traverse, could hardly be of possible use as an avenue for trading vessels or for pleasure parties, while from what is known of the commercial products of the region there seems to be little prospect of a return on the cost of exploration were this purely a business venture. The value of polar research, therefore, to the very best of our present knowledge, lies in fields other than the commercial.

The exploration of the poles has, however, a value to science, and like many other matters in which much money is spent, this lies in added information or knowledge and mental satisfaction. Practically all the value of the science of astronomy lies apart from any help that it can give us in a business way. It is very true that we depend upon astronomy for our time, for great help in the navigation of vessels across the ocean, and for the ability to determine how far apart two places may be on the

It is due time the two pictures were packed in separate crates and shipped to Paris and in due time the answers came back.

His answer was a box with his picture, returned with a due acknowledgment; Mrs. Nichols' picture, returned with a due acknowledgment; Mrs. Nichols' picture, returned with a due acknowledgment.

Then, says Mrs. Nichols' friends, the man's nature seemed to change overnight. He became grumpy and cross. Nothing seemed to please him. The iron had entered his soul. The wife had outdone the husband in his chosen sphere of life. Oh, strange phase of a man's nature, which makes such a thing unforfeitable!

Some old philosopher has called love "the epidemic of two." The epidemic of Mrs. Nichols had received a fatal blow, and under that blow withered. There was no more peace, no more happiness in the household.
