

Wide Range of Subjects Covered in the Document of the State's Chief Executive.

A European statistician has published carefully prepared figures of longevity which tend to throw a rather remarkable light on the relation, first of progress, and secondly on climate, to the duration of life. It would appear that Germany, with a population at the time of 55,000,000, counted less than 80 centenarians, or in the ratio of one to 700,000; while the ratio is lower still in Denmark, where as much as 250,000 are counted. Here it is one to 1,500,000, and that it rises in Sweden (1,600,000), England (1,250,000), France (1,100,000), Norway and Scotland (1,100,000), and Spain (1,405,000), till it attains an ascending height in the Balkans, where Roumania can show one centenarian for every 5,000 inhabitants, Servia one for every 4,500, and Bulgaria one for every 3,000. The obvious deduction would be that climate is determining the length of life, and that the Mediterranean countries enjoy especially favorable conditions in this respect. The vegetarian should also have his mind very much interested in the fact that the principal peoples of the south that have approached nearest to the secret of immortality. It is in certain parts of the Balkans that Elie Metchnikoff found old age to flourish, and he ascribed it largely to the use of the diet of fermented milk. But it is also obvious that centenarianism varies inversely with the scale of civilization. There is, however, the cheerful reflection that longevity also seems to vary inversely with the scale of literacy, and that perhaps statistics in Servia are not kept so carefully as in Germany. Tchekow'sk's music may not be the only medium in which the Slav imagination utters itself.
