

Since Washington planned a canal from the Atlantic to the Ohio and Madison tried the second one from the Mississippi to Lake Michigan, artificial connections have been proposed between almost every two important natural waterways of the continent a time the development of railways obscured the interest in the canals. The Erie canal and others fell into comparative disuse. Meantime other countries have continued to open new waterways and make great use of them. The advantages of water transportation, chiefly its cheapness as compared with railway traffic, have revived interest in canals. To say nothing of the Panama canal, the new Erie canal which takes thousands of barges from the lakes to the ocean, and the Chicago drainage canal, constructed as a sewage way and certain to be completed as a ship way, are examples of what may be done. In four systems—the rivers of the Pacific, the rivers of the Atlantic, the Mississippi and its tributaries, and the great lakes. That there will ever be a cut through the Rockies to the Pacific, or that the canal systems is beyond the dreams of engineers, remarks the Youth's Companion, but any will with a map may trace the conduits that will make the other three systems a great unit of waterway. Following are the routes they show on the map, draw a line from the Mississippi to Green Bay, from Minneapolis to Duluth, from Cincinnati to Lake Erie, from Ashabua to Pittsburgh, and the great inland lakes have become seaports. Draw another line from Boston to Providence by way of Taunton or across Cape Cod—the canal is already provided for.

The Power of Prejudice. A curious illustration of deep-seated prejudice is seen in the strong opposition displayed toward the plan to construct a tunnel under the English channel from England to France, which has recently been proposed, and has a good chance to go through unless British hostility shall result in parliament blocking the scheme. The plan contemplates a double tunnel for railway purposes, about 24 miles in length, to be constructed at about $80,000,000. It is believed the engineering problem is comparatively an easy one, as the rock through which a passage will be cut is of the chalky order and can be readily drilled. The construction of such a tunnel in the earlier, more primitive phases of the undertaking, have been carefully looked after. It is admitted that the tunnel, if completed, will confer immense benefit, and that English manufacturers, by having a direct line to the continent, can be shipped directly and without breaking bulk to continental markets, will score enormous advantage. Still, there is a strong antagonism to the tunnel, generated principally by the impractical defense of the channel, which is in the tunnel a menace to national security. The fear of invasion appears to be uppermost in many British minds and this apprehension creates lively visions of an enemy pouring in by way of the which is pierced in the chalk. Dover cliffs, yet, says Troy Times, a little charge of dynamite would instantly put the tunnel out of business and the result of flood would drown any foe who happened to be sneaking through to strike a deadly blow at Albion.

Indians are not always the grave-faced orators of Cooper. According to Mr. Leupp, the commissioner of Indian affairs, they are the original American humorists. He once gave a number of them a lecture on their duties to the agent, pointing out that he needed time to eat, with his family and to rest. An aged Indian of great intellect explained that the last agent for the tribe never did anything but rest.
