TALE OF THE OLD WEST

CHAPTER XXXVI.—Continued.

In the light of the fire the little man could see their faces, and he became suddely coherent, smiling at them in the old way.

"Why have you come so far in the night?" he asked Prudence, taking one of her cool hands between his own that burned.

"But, you poor little father." Why have you come, when you should be home in bed? You are burning with fever."

"Yes, yes, dear, but it's over now. This is the end. I came here—to be here—I came to say my last prayer in the body. And they will come to find me here. You must go before they come.

"But, father, you are sick, and so weak—let us wait."

"It will give me such foy to do it—and this is the last."

"He'd like it, and it's what we want—all simple," he said.
In the light of the fire they stood with hands joined, and the little man, too, got to his feet, helping himself up by the cairn against which he had here learned.
