THE GREAT GAME

By AGNES LOUISE PROVOST

(Copyright, by Shortstory Pub. Co.)

It was a big day at the race track, and it was also a holiday, there were at least four thousand men crowding and pushing one another in the pool room.

There were three men among the 4,000 who were vitally interested in each other's movements, but it was not for the same reason.

Mr. Lyman melted away into the crowd like fog before the sunshine, being by nature ever modest and retiring when an official appeared on the track.

"Hell!" observed Mr. Collins profanely, staring around him in an unbecomingly vacant stare.

"Sure thing, Browney's up in front. He's done up something great. It's his time now."

Mr. Collins expressed a desire that the immortal part of J. Browney's race should be a roaring success for the cause of an indefinite future.

"They follow me all the way from Price," he grumbled wrathfully, "and three times this month we've just got off with our necks."

"And have the whole 'U. S. K. we did it? Not an over tincture, Mickey. I don't throw my head away like that."

Mr. Collins worked his jaw swiftly back to the front, his eyes quickly looked out. One would have said that he was enjoying the beauty of the morning sky.

The reasons why Messrs Lyman and Collins were so greatly in demand were numerous and varied.

Mr. Collins found his partner in a marvelous short time. He was used to it. He shook his head a trifle, which meant that he considered the picture was not of an encouraging nature.

"If we run for it when the crowd goes out to the track, there'll be a million damn Abecks ready to help us catch up," he noted disconsolately.

"I don't think we ought to do it," Mr. Lyman said, "but if we do, we'll be in a good place, and nab us. But they don't know our own necks."
