

MARKING THE ALASKAN BOUNDARY

BY THOMAS RIGGS, JR.

HERE had been some dispute as to what constituted the boundary of the country bought from Russia by the United States in 1867, but until the real value of the territory was known, no one cared. The miners of the early days managed very well with an approximate boundary. They held miners' meetings and any decision reached by them constituted the law. For the opening up of Alaska we are indebted to the panic of 1892. Throughout the west the harder spirits preferred to brave the dangers of that almost unknown region than to accept the starvation wages then offered. They knew that grubstakes and independence were to be found on the bars of the Forty Mile, the Stewart, and at Circle City.

With the increase of population came the representatives of the American and Canadian governments, custom-house and court decisions took the place of the rule. Justice dispensed by miners' meetings. With the new order of things came also the necessity of a determined line between the two countries.

The United States claimed, under the old Russian treaty, a line running up Portland canal to the 56th parallel of north latitude, thence to follow the summit of the coast range to its intersection with the 141st meridian. In the absence of a definite mountain range near the coast, the line was to be not more than two marine leagues distant from tide water.

Canada claimed that the line should follow the course paralleling the general contour of the coast, and cutting across all inlets and fjords. There were other contentions of minor importance, but the real trouble was that Canada thought she was entitled to a report which would allow of shipments through Canadian territory to the now valuable Klondike.

As to the 141st meridian being the rest of the boundary, there was no dispute. This line starts at a ridge of Mount Saint Elias and runs through to Demarcation Point on the Arctic ocean.

Maps showing a strip of land along the coast were made, archives were rummaged, every available bit of history and tradition were searched, and the whole mass submitted as evidence to a tribunal of three Americans, two Canadians, and one Englishman, which met in London in 1890.

The sifting of the evidence required three months. The opposing counsel held by the geographic experts put forth their best arguments, a vote was taken, and the result showed four to two in favor of the United States, the lord chief justice of England, Lord Alverstone, casting his vote with the Americans.

Naturally the Canadian representatives felt grossly disappointed, but the evidence was too conclusive to allow of any other outcome. Then came the question of what mountains constituted the coast range. In places a compromise was effected departing slightly from the claims of the United States.

It was decided that certain well-defined peaks on the mountains fringing the coast should constitute the high points on the boundary. Lord Alverstone, wielding a blue pencil, marked on the maps what appeared to the tribunal to be the proper mountains. The members of the tribunal, all eminent jurists, but this did not make them proficient in the intricacies of cartography, and the advice of the experts was constantly requested.

The location of the boundary was left to two commissioners, Mr. O. H. Pittman, superintendent of the coast and geodetic survey, for the United States, and Dr. W. F. King, chief Dominion astronomer for Canada.

Wherever the blue-pencil mark appears on the map, this point without any recourse to a boundary point, even though a higher and better point could be found, is to be taken as the boundary.

To follow the sinuosities of the mountain ranges in this country would be hopeless, so the commissioners will probably decide that a straight line connecting the various blue-penciled points shall constitute the boundary.

The actual demarcation of the boundary, to be satisfactory to both governments, must be done jointly. By this it is not meant that there is a

of being able to throw himself down to rest and enjoy the stupor of nature, there is immediate work to be done, and a few clouds hovering over some distant mountain, instead of lending beauty to the view, may send the poor surveyor behind some sheltering rock to wait, shivering with cold, until morning will allow him to take up his stand by the theodolite and complete his observations.

On the 141st meridian an astro-nomic longitude was determined at a point on the Yukon river. American and Canadian astronomers worked together, bringing time over the wires both from Seattle and Vancouver. An azimuth was then observed and this azimuth is being prolonged in its straight shot across the peninsula. This line has been accepted as the 141st meridian and consequently the boundary. It has been run into the mountains fringing the Pacific coast. Topography, triangulation, line-cutting, and monumenting are now being carried along the located line.

For the present the line will not run to Mount St. Elias. It would be possible, but not practical, to run it across the intervening 80 miles of snow and ice and towering mountain ranges. To complete this part of the boundary the use of an airship is contemplated.

In the interior the difficulties of the work are changed. Long wooded stretches, interrupted by barren ridges, take the place of glaciers and craggy mountains. In place of snow fields there are heart-breaking "tiger head" stamps to be worked where the pack-horse becomes mired and exhausted and the temper of man belated to the breaking point. Supplies have to be ferried across the rivers on log rafts, with the horses swimming.

There is no longer the guiding line of the coast to follow, and the surveyor must rely on his instinct for topography and on woodcraft to pilot him through an unbroken wilderness.

The inconveniences of transportation have to be overcome, and year by year they are becoming worse as the work carries us each year farther from the Yukon and the steamer. For the season of 1909 the American party of 30 men will have to walk 300 miles before they can even start work.

Then the topographer with his theodolite tries to be the best of both worlds. Mistakes in location of caches are sometimes made, and last season one surveyor in consequence of such a mistake was without food for two days, finally reaching his cache with rather discolored conditions. So happened that this other party was moving south toward the same cache and was on short rations, so nothing but "tiger head" stamps to be carried 50 miles northward, arriving at another base with belts pinned to the last note.

Usually bases of supply are established at certain known points before the opening of the season. These are called "caches." Mistakes in the location of caches are sometimes made, and last season one surveyor in consequence of such a mistake was without food for two days, finally reaching his cache with rather discolored conditions. So happened that this other party was moving south toward the same cache and was on short rations, so nothing but "tiger head" stamps to be carried 50 miles northward, arriving at another base with belts pinned to the last note.

Not Finished.

"Americans are so unfinished," has been the complaint of Europeans. We are glad of it, and are glad of their achievements and will, we believe, stick to the habit.

Uneasy Lies the Head, Etc.

Physicians' Fees Fixed by Law.

A German antiquarian has found documents showing that in ancient Babylon, 4100 years ago, the sums due to doctors for treatment were fixed by law. They varied according to the social position of the patient.

A Spanish Museo Social will be opened in Barcelona in November, 1909, supported by the provincial assembly and the municipality. The object of the Museo Social is to gather in a single exposition data of all sorts, instruments, apparatus, models, ethnology and more. The committee calls special attention to the social questions and problems and at the same time create a permanent organization for study and development.
