

Beating the Bookies

By JOHN IRVING DAY

In the Realm of High and Low Finance

"Tell you, Danny, it's hard by worth the candle. The police are keeping a close watch on poor fellows like us. We're liable to nab the whole bunch before you could turn a trick." Doc Floyd, master of the "High Rollers" club, was uttering words of wisdom to Danny Roberts, player of favorite rolls in the life drama enacted by the members of the club.

"But, old man, I've just to sell the professor a package, and there's nothing that would be so easy. He's bugs on the race. I've met him and got his confidence, and he doesn't know that I've got it in for him so hard that I'm going to make him take the high jump."

"But why have you got to resort to the old wire game to land him? Questioned Floyd. "And you haven't told me what game you're going against him. Tell me about it."

"Well, if you only knew him, you wouldn't need to ask why anyone would want to hand him a package," replied Danny.

Could Herr Oberman, teacher of vocal music, by an overall and comprehended the conversation that was going on between Danny Roberts and Doc Floyd he had looked his questioner in the eye with a fortune in the strong box of some safe deposit company and thrown the key away. Herr Oberman, graduate from the ranks of rascally musicians, had opened what he was pleased to term a conservatory of music in a Michigan avenue building flattered by others of his kind. There, in a grand hall, with short years, he had waxed fat in purse and person, hiring into his net, by attractive advertisements, young men and women with ambitions to outshine the Methus and Mary Gardens of grand opera. To all of these he promised great things, but so prima donna over the years, he graduated from the school of Oberman. He was only one of many who preyed on the vanity of women who believed themselves possessed of divine voices.

It was a smiling, cheerful Danny Roberts that greeted the professor in the dining pool room of the club. Conversation with Doc Floyd.

"No other good dip, we have," was the cheerful remark of Herr Oberman when he had read the message which advised a good bet on Cheese Cake. "I'll make those bookies fella's sick."

"That's it," replied Danny. "I've already got my bet down. You'd better hurry up before they cut the price. I'll see you later. I've got to get down the street to meet a party."

Danny did not wait to see the frantic look and hear the swear words in German which were emitted by the professor when Cheese Cake failed to be heard from in the race. He had just a cent of his own money, but had faked a telegram for the express purpose of having Oberman lose.

The next day Oberman was waiting anxiously in the pool room when Danny came to see him. Before the professor could start to tell of his hard luck and how he had lost a whole hundred dollars, Danny produced another telegram explaining that Cheese Cake had been kicked and crippled at the post, which accounted for his poor race. The second message also advised that Danny had bet down good on Harvest. This time Danny waited with Oberman to hear the running of the race called off by the telegraph instrument.

"They're off! Rarebit in the lead, Handy Hill second. The others bunched," and Danny whistled at the announcer's words, for he had not expected Rarebit to be heard from on the previous day.

"Cashbox wins!" and Danny gave a sigh of relief which Oberman took to be one of pain accompanying his own good. "Cashbox wins!" continued the announcer. "Narcissus is third."

"Now what do you think of that for hard luck!" was the mock moan of Danny to the professor. "There are leading all the way and then our horse drops out of sight. I'm going to quit this game. It's impossible to bet on the horse with what is supposed to be the very best of information."

Professor was glad to listen to Danny. He had troubled his own head. It was a cheaper drink than his own. He took when they adjourned to the bar room under the pool. As they took their drink Danny produced a telegram that he was going to try to bring the pool room until he found a surer way of beating it. He hinted mysteriously that he had some such way in mind and told Herr Oberman inasmuch as he had caused him to lose by allowing him to bet on his tips he might be able to let him in on a good thing where they could do better than get even in a day or two. As he said goodby to Danny told the professor, not to do any more betting until he had heard from him, which might be on the morrow.

Herr Oberman was just bowing his last pupil of the day out of the Oberman school of vocal culture. It was but three o'clock in the afternoon, but Herr Oberman had arrived at the time when he could make his choice of words for his pupils. It was none too cordial a greeting he gave Danny Roberts, who fished in excitedly right at his closing hour.

"I've got it!" whispered Danny, excitedly. "There anyone here who can hear us?"

"No. What is it?" inquired the professor, becoming interested.

"Don't ask me now. I haven't got time to explain. Get your hat and come with me. We must hurry."

The excitement of Danny was contagious and before he knew it Herr Oberman was in the elevator and speeding towards the street. Once on the sidewalk Danny, who had his friend under his arm, turned and looked at the Western Union building. There he almost big play from the board of trade men and other big bugs. They never turn an eyelid at a $5,000 bet. There's a telephone booth right here in the saloon where our friend Brown can call me up. We are just in time for the fifth race at Los Angeles. My friend Brown is going to call me up here as bet down."

"Just so we'll be certain everything will go through all right, we'll only make a hundred dollar bet today, and then if it is O. K. we can pick out a race tomorrow to make our killing in. After that, there's nothing to hinder us from taking in some of the other rooms and we ought to be able to clean up a hundred thousand dollars apiece without anyone getting on to our game."

No such thing as a conscientious scruple occurred to Herr Oberman as He trembled with excitement, Herr Oberman grasped the receiver and was informed that Mr. Brown was talking. He wrote down the names of three horses: Wild Cat, first; Sweet Alice, second; and Romeo, third.

"All right, you bet your $2,000 on Wild Cat, and I'll play Sweet Alice for $500. I'll be right with you. Any professor had showed the names he had carefully penciled on the back of an envelope.

Why crying like a baby?"

A moment after the wagers had been recorded the telephone sounder began to ring. The three horses at the race were off in low tones that the race was announced. The bettors crowded close to hear the calling of the description of the race. The three horses as giving Herr Oberman were all prominent in the running throughout.

And then—"Romeo wins!"

"What?" shrieked the professor.

"Wild Cat, second."

"Hill!" shouted Danny.

"Sweet Alice, third," continued the operator in low, singing tones.

"Whipped away or I'm a goat," muttered Danny, as he pulled the almost fainting Herr Oberman to one side.
