the recently reformed gullotine, and whenever there is to be executed one of the Apaches flock from all districts of the city to witness the ghastly sight. Silently they stand, gazing at the grim instrument of death, until the condemned individual is brought forth. Then jeers and howls break forth from the crowd, and as the knife falls the Apaches rush forward to rip their handkerchiefs in the blood. These they preserve as souvenirs, or sell them to the degenerates of the upper classes.

Strangely enough, the male Apaches nearly all look alike. They are hollow-cheeked, dark-haired, fatigued, shambling of gait and sallow of complexion—always easily recognized among the throngs on the streets. The women on the other hand, as a rule, are handsome, spirited and intelligent. They dress well and give special attention to the care of their hair, which they never cover with a hat. All of them, men and women, profess to follow some trade as a safeguard against the occasional raids of the police on their haunts.

Official Paris is somewhat dismayed by the rapidly growing number of robberies and murders attributable to them. It is increasing monthly, and as the victims very often are travelers from foreign lands, the crime is doing an appreciable effect on tourist business.

“FLAG DAY.”

NE morning not long ago a well-dressed foreigner, evidently an American tourist, was found dead on the pavement in a side street of Paris. Twisted about his neck was a dirty handkerchief with which he had been strangled; he had been brutally kicked and beaten, and in his chest were several knife wounds, any one of which would have killed him. The unfortunate man had been stripped of all money, jewelry and other valuables.

“Les Apaches,” said the police, stolidly. “He should have known better than to go prowling about alone at night.” And in the police records another murder was put on the score of the thugs of the “ray capital.”

Paris is not proud of her Apaches, and the rest of the world has known little of these criminal bands, though their goings in many American cities during the last season were given a glimpse of when a tourist was found dead on the pavement in a side street of Paris. ## FOODS THAT SEEM STRANGE

French Cooks Display Odd Liking for Vizards That Appear Strange to the American.

French epicures, like French cooks, have long been known as having the gift of originality. From them we learn that fried lizards must be very appetizing; so are young crocodiles and snakes. A writer in the Oil Bulletin has discovered that these articles

First Flag to Float Over North American Soil.

The first flag of evolution was raised two years before the settlement of Jamestown, when James I. of England in honor of the union, placed the diagonal white cross of St. Andrew with the red cross of St. George, both upon a blue field. This is the first blighting of the American national colors—history to the red, white and blue is as old as the country, as it appeared in the flags which floated over the Virginia settlement and was the flag of the Mayflower and of Plymouth.
