

Alison's story.

She told her story event, with her eyes on the water, only now and then when I, too, sat looking seaward.

SYNOPSIS.

Lawrence Blakeley, lawyer, goes to the town of Birmingham, Ala., to get the deposition of a certain Harry Sullivan. Sullivan is a man of whom Blakeley has heard nothing in the past few years.

"You don't realize it, probably," she protested, "but you look like a—a war dog. Your face is horrible."

"I don't want to hear anything that distresses you to tell," I assured her. "I didn't come here to force your confidences, Alison. I came because I couldn't help it."

CHAPTER XXVIII—Continued.

And when the endless miles were over, yards of white veils had been tied over pods of hair—or is it, too, bought by the yard?

"Mother had a nurse, and I was alone a great deal, and they were very kind to me. I—I saw a lot of them."

"I did you marry him?" I demanded, pretending to go to St. Louis Harbor, and really went to St. Louis.

She was sitting on an overturned boat, her chin in her hands, starting out to sea. The soft tide was lapping all about at her feet, and the draperies of her white gown melted into the sands.

"I was sorry of course, the moment the train had started, but I had just had a devotion, and could not go back, and then when I got there, the place was charming. They were no neighbors, but we fished and rode and motored, and it was wonderful, like this."

WAYS OF MIDDLEAGED MAN He Finds His Greatest Happiness in a Life That is Youth is Irksome.

"Younger people," said the middle-aged man, "want variety, they want change, they want to know someone or something different all the time. Other people are happiest in a life of routine, most disturbed when variety is thrust upon them."
