The LOOKER
WILBUR D. NESBITT
FATHER'S SYMBOLIC DANCES.

is the thing: The Dancon-Allen-Genee school has taken up this subject.

But not to show the meaning By expression, pose and leaning Of the classic compositions that the people play and sing.

Their subtle symbolism. In expressive paroxysm Of dear father's heat and child's When he looks upon the billie.

When mother got new paper for the parlor and the hall, And brought her scoldings to be hung upon the wall, Then father gave a shrug, And his feet began to scuffle. As though he realized forces that were bound to make him fall, And he symbolized his curses With a pair of empty purses Gazing sadly in the air While he stared a hopeless stare.

DR. ANDREW B. SPENNEY,

When sister got her bonnet and her opera cloak and dress.

Then dear father did a dance-step with remarkable success.

He looked his eyes almost splattered. He humbled and he muttered.

And he curved his spinal column accumulating sore distress.

While a flush all purple-torrid Poured across his haggard forehead, Indicating that his eyes

Found the bills of awful size.

The meat man and the grocer and the milkman and the rest. Provoke dear father to a mood that seems to be his best.

He makes all other dancers seem as mere feeble prancers. When compared with the gyrations by which his thoughts are expressed.

There's a subtle symbolism Of expressive paroxysm In the man's heat and child's When he gazes at the Bit!

"The man with the sarcastic grin is having fun with the man with the confiding air."

"And you wear a cabbage leaf in your hat to avoid sunstroke," jeers the man with the sarcastic grin.

"Well, I've never had a sunstroke, and I never wore a cabbage leaf in my hat, either."

At this the man with the confiding air lives up.

"You don't have to," he replies. "You've got a cabbage head in your hat all the time."

When their friends separated there it was noted that one had lost his sarcastic grin and the other his confiding air.

That After Feeling.

The man had been away on a vacation. His neck was sunblistered, his eyes were weak from the glare of the sun, his hands were sore and calloused, his feet were painful, his arms ached, his pocketbook was empty, and he was tired.

Nevertheless he trudged all the way up Broadway and on to the office of Russell Sage.

"Mr. Sage," he remarked, entering the office of that wise man, "I beg your pardon for intruding, but I simply wish to tell you that now I am in full accord with your views on the vacation question."

That Helper.

"But how in the world am I to coax up a pleasant expression with my chin twisted to an unnatural angle and my hands propped across my lap in such a strained way, and these cold tongs gripping the back of my neck?" petulantly asked the sitter.

"Easily enough," asserted the photographer, adjusting his black cloth. "Just think of how good you will feel when the sitting is over."

A Serious Error.

"You have made a terrible blunder," said the chief surgeon to the hospital assistant.

"Why, what have I done?" demanded the assistant.

"You gave a dose of pargecol to that millionaire patient and sent the charity patient to the operating ward to be operated on for appendicitis."

He Made His Bow.

We meet the gentleman who delights thousands each night by his clever impersonation of a dog, in appropriate costume, in the great extravaganza and spectacular production.

"You're must be an exacting role," we say, seeking to seem interested in his work.

"Indeed, yes," he replies. "It is Sirius work to be the dog star."

Good Rule.

"What I want to do," said the ambitious youth, "is to get there with both feet."

"Don't worry about getting there with your feet," advised the sagacious uncle. "Get there with both hands."

"And why, uncle?"

"You'll find that you can hold more in your hands."

Fate.

"Isn't it interesting," mused the fair young thing, "how everbody seems to marry his or her opposite?"

"Or he or she doesn't always marry his or her opposite," argued the cynical man. "But after marriage it doesn't take them long to be opposites."
