

FEARS OF THE LIFE OF A MASTER ADVENTURER

By Captain George B. Boynton

COPYRIGHT BY RIDGWAY COMPANY

Months ago—Capt. George B. Boynton died a few months ago a disease which he had contracted during his last voyage to the West Indies...

On the false charge that my papers were forged, the agent for Lloyd's, with whom the ship was insured, had me arrested...

I pleaded my own case and, as soon as I found get a hearing, was released, but in the meantime the agent for the underwriters had libeled my ship and sold her at auction...

After a survey of the available supply, I hit on the Ferret, a handsome and fairly fast passenger steamer belonging to the High-Land Railway Company, which was lying at Chiswick Bay on the Clyde...

My plan was to go back out East and dig up the guns from Norton and I had hurried to a little island west of the Chesapeake...

We sailed at Cardiff and cleared for Malaga. We passed Gibraltar late in the afternoon, as was intended, and signaled "All well" to the Leda...

Every man agreed to stay with me. I thereupon rechristened the ship the India—a name indignantly held by a vessel on the other side of the world...

Pittsburgh's Smoke Nuisance

Over $500,000 worth of lumps of coal are mined in Pittsburgh, the professor said, there was a ton of coal in every quarter ton of soot...

of having Nourse take my place. "What do you say, Nourse?" to changing places with me and letting yourself be arrested, if it comes to that?"

As soon as we reached Longwood we exchanged clothing, even down to our underwear, socks and shoes.

The orders of the officers called for the arrest of only one man, so I was not interfered with on my return to Melbourne on the same train with them the next morning...

Nourse and Wilson were sentenced to seven years and Leigh to three and one-half years in Pentridge Prison.

I was much interested in reports which reached me, through contraband channels, that a new revolution was shaping up in Costa Rica...

I found that General Alcantara was acting as dummy President, while Guzman was enjoying himself in Europe, and I soon satisfied myself from remarks dropped by my friends...

Boat Run by Soap.

A writer is selected to be an ingenious little skiff about two inches long which he constructed and provided with a piece of soap for the motor.
