Oddities in the Fancy Feathers

If we knew where all the oddities in feathers came from we would be amazed at the resourcefulness of feather manufacturers. They take the plumage of all our barnyard inhabitants and manipulate it into new and strange and beautiful forms. They dye and trim and paste and bleach until we cannot even guess the origin of the feathers which charm us with their queer shapes and markings.

This is the day of triumph for fancy feathers, and no wonder. They deserve their popularity.

Two lovely hats pictured here show how effectively these odd new ornaments in feathers trim the pretty, demi-dress hats which make up the most useful of our millinery belongings. The first model, with soft crown of velvet and small rolling brim, is a draped affair in taupe color. The crown is managed so that two points or loops of velvet are a part of it. It is a clever bit of draping, too, managing to convert the small, plain turban shape into a little Rembrandt hat of excellent style.

Along one side, and extending into the back, small, ragged chrysanthemums of grayish pink shadings outline the upward lift of the velvet. Springing from the back five sprightly feathers complete an elegant conception in millinery. These dashing feathers come from the guinea hen or perhaps from the woodduck. At any rate they are all in the natural colors, gray, with white dots laid on, in the incomparable beauty which nature accomplishes. But they have been retrimmed and reshaped by the artist in fancy feathers. A small "eye" in irridescent plumage, with a marking of white, has been pasted on. These add a sparkle to the otherwise grave coloring.

From the pheasant, probably, the beautiful, mottled feathers shown in the other hat, were taken. The standing quills are not changed, except that they are shortened. The band about the crown is of small feathers sewed to a foundation.

Often a long, soft quill takes the place of a feather band, and is laid about the brim in the same way as a band. Among the shapes which turn up at the side or back the mounting of these quills and bands is accomplished by making a slit in the brim and thrusting the quill through this. Nothing else is needed on a soft, velour or velvet or beaver hat for trimming, although ribbon in the color of the hat is often used with the feather band.

With a world of lovely fancy feathers to choose from, there is no good reason to lament one's inability to buy more expensive but not more beautiful trimmings. And all those feathers which involve the practice of cruelty to obtain them, or those which threaten the extinction of species of beautiful birds, cannot possibly be in good taste on the heads of women. For they bespeak an indifference which is unkind, and therefore unwomanly. The responsibility rests upon women.

CIVET FUR TO BE FEATURE OF COMING SEASON

CIVET cat gives us the very dark fur with striking markings in white which is so much in demand for the coming season. The markings are managed by the furriers with remarkable resourcefulness, for it seems one hardly sees two pieces that are alike.

A muff and scarf are shown here that are more ample than the average sets of this fur. In fact, such striking fur is better used in smaller quantities and as a trimming for other furs, or for neck pieces and muff made of velvet or other fabrics. This scarf and neck piece show the size and shape of many similar sets in other furs. The scarf is plain and the muff rather large and flat. It is curved on the lower edges at the corners. The handsomest and the most expensive furs are made up along their lines.

There is a great vogue of small neck pieces of fur to be worn with hats and muffs made of velvet or other fabrics, trimmed with fur like that in the neck piece. For instance, a neck piece of moleskin is worn with a soft little hat made of brocaded crepe and chiffon in mole color, and a muff of the same fabrics having narrow bands of moleskin. A touch of lace on the hat and muff is often added. A single bright flower is silk or velvet or cloth of gold finishes the hat most effectively.

These neck pieces, with hat and muff made to be worn with them, make up a set that is quite as expensive as the better fur sets, unless they can be made at home. Muffs are not difficult to make, and the simpler sets can be successfully managed by are to be had in several sizes and are not expensive. The velvet or brocade or other fabric is draped on the bed and a shirred lining of satin messaline provided, which should match the outside in color. In order to make a muff successfully it is best to examine one at the furrier's and be guided by it. Milliners usually are prepared to make the muffs to match hats and will help one who buys material of them, with suggestions. The value of these pretty pieces lies as much in the making as in the goods. Among the furs available for trimming, none is better than civet. A small neck piece of civet with hat and muff of black velvet trimmed with narrow bands of the same fur and finished with a little good lace, leaves nothing to be desired. The white of the civet fur is yellowish and goes unusually well with creamy laces.

Very satisfactory beds for muffs are easily made of wool batting. Two or three rolls of it will be enough for a muff. Such a bed keeps its shape well and is very warm. The bed should be covered with a thin muslin first, tacked on at the top and bottom. Two puffs of velvet and two bands of fur make the outside covering, with a cascade of lace at the front. In place of lace, limp ruffles of crepe chiffon are often used. A muff is among the most graceful of dress accessories and comfortable beyond expression.

The possessor of a fur cape or coat that has become shabby may cut the good portions and make bands for trimming a set made of velvet. The small collar is lined with a thin wadding, under soft satin. The muff is made as already described. A turban shape with soft crown of velvet is finished with a band of fur. A little touch of color in flower or ornament is the last word in this little poem of comfort. It is in such combinations that civet fur shows to best advantage.

Coats of sealskin and Hudson seal are finished with collars and cuffs of civet, and narrow bands of it appear at the neck and sleeves of cloth or velvet gowns; oftenest in those designed with a Russian blouse. It is smart and it is fashionable and is to be recommended when used sparingly.

Darned Lace.

Not old lace mended, as the title would suggest, but new lace darned with silks of many colors, or of one shade to match the gown, is to adorn. Procure a lace containing a large flower design, for the first experiment, and preferably band insertion; it is easier to handle. Take soft floss silk of the desired shade and darn over the flower. If there is foliage in the design, the leaves may be darned in green, or it is not necessary to embroider them at all.

Velvet Slipper.

A velvet slipper seems an absurd thing for street wear, yet it is very smart at the moment. The new slippers in black velvet are arranged across the instep, sometimes with a cut silver buckle, or again with a flat enameled [illegible]
