"Maybe they put him in the room across the hall yonder."
"What would he be doing there?" asked Wilfred, not yet apprehending the situation from Thorne's remarks.
"Nothing," said the other bitterly; "I guess he is dead."

"Well, let him have a trial. We'll give him a drumhead court-martial but it will be the quickest ever held on earth. Stack your muskets here and organize a court," he said.
Arrelford came to a sudden decision.

CHAPTER XIX.

The Drumhead Court-Martial.
It so happened that the soldiers who had thrust old Jonas back in his closet, whence they had taken him a short time before, in his haste, had failed to lock the door upon him. The negro, who was in the room for the click of the key in the lock, had at once known of their carelessness. So soon as they were withdrawn from the room, and their sentry took them to other parts of the house, he had opened the door cautiously and had looked into the hall by the drawing-room, which he felt instinctively was the place where the exciting events of the night would soon culminate.
Thorne's entry and the circumstances of his apprehension had been so arranged that no one had given a thought to Jonas, or to any other part of the house, for that matter, and he had been able to see everything through the long narrow doorway. He was a quick-witted old negro, and he knew of course, that there would be but one result of such a court-martial as had assembled in the room filled with stacks of arms. Every soldier, even those under the command of Corporal Matson in Arrelford's department, had got into the room as if they were attracted there by some force. Every gun was there in that room, unaccountably.

A recent capture of a battalion of Federal riflemen had put the Confederates into possession of a few hundred breech-loading weapons, not the latest and most approved pattern, for the cartridges in these guns were of an antiquated style, still being used in the south possessed. These rifles had been distributed to some of the companies in garrison at Richmond, and so happened to be among the men of the secret service squad and the provost guard had received most of them. Every gun in the stacks was of this pattern.
In his earlier days, Jonas had been pushed aside the portieres with which he had concealed himself, and entered the room by the back door.
He moved with catlike swiftness in the direction of the first stack of rifles. He knelt down by the side of the nearest gun, which lay across the floor, and he opened the breech-loading, drew out the cartridge, looked at it a moment, put the cap in his mouth, and crunched his strong white teeth down upon it. When he finished, he had a leaden bullet in his mouth, and the cardboard shell in his hand. He replaced this latter in the chamber and closed the breech-plug. A smile of triumph irradiated his sallow features. The gun could not fire, but whatever or whoever stood in front of it would be unharmed. He had not been quite sure that he could do this, but the result of his experiment convinced him. All the while he kept a sharp eye on the room, and given the time, he could render them all harmless. He did not waste time in reflection, but started into the room, and in a few minutes he worked with furious haste until every bullet had been bitten off every cartridge.

HUMAN BEING AS A FACTORY

Writing in Atlantic Monthly, Gerald Stanley Lee Made a Remarkably Comprehensive Comparison.
A human being is a kind of factory. The engine and the works and all the various machines are kept in the basement, and he sends down orders to them from time to time, and they do the work which has been concerted up on head-quarters. He expects the works down below to keep on doing these things without his taking any particular notice of them. As long as they do their work, and he does not mind them, he does not care for them. The head of the secret service department said to me I found him, he said him at night," said Arrelford.
"I don't care what General Tarleton said. I captured this man; he's in his house, and he's not going out unless he is treated fairly."
The sergeant looked uncertainly from Wilfred to Arrelford. Mrs. Varney who had entered with the rest of them, and who now stood by her daughter's side, looked her approval at her son. The motto of his distin-
