SYNOPSIS.

Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds move into their new apartment. Bob Reynolds, a newspaper man, critic, socializer, takes up his abode in the new place. Bob is comfortable in his home, but Mrs. Reynolds is not. She is a socialista, a feminist, a reformer. She is expected to call on Mrs. Collins, a socialista, a feminist, a reformer. She is expected to call on Mrs. Collins, a socialista, a feminist, a reformer. She is expected to call on Mrs. Collins, a socialista, a feminist, a reformer.

CHAPTER XV—Continued.

"I don't say you have Jane. I'm not accusing you of anything. I am just looking at it from the outsider's point of view. Honestly," he continued warmly, "I haven't a thought in the world that you have done anything wrong, but you may have blundered, and, Jane, when a poor man's wife sees suddenly a rich man in her husband's absence, it's going to hurt. It's a lot of love to make him overlook it, and a lot more to keep him from guessing at what's been going on."

CHAPTER XVI.

He heard the honk of the returning car and Mrs. Collins' thanks and farewell to the chauffeur. Brand took out his watch, then glanced at Reynolds.

Colins. "I don't think this is going to be a very good day for auto riding."

"What," Reynolds demanded. "There's Mrs. Brand now."

"I'll go," he said Reynolds, and his tone suggested quite forcibly that no one else would take the three stood as if petrified as he opened the door.

"What you home?" said the astonished Brand.

"I'm here by appointment to meet your wife. You're here with three other people. I thought I knew where you and your wife were here but I don't think so now. If Mrs. Reynolds hasn't told you the purpose of my visit, you'd better describe it to me. Do you take me for a comedian? If you do you're crazier than I thought you. But I'm not here to argue. I'm here to explain. I don't want to be a nuisance to you. You may have fooled her with your devilish clever pretenses, but you can't fool me. If there's any other way for you to get out of here than just one way, God knows I need to know it."

Reduction in Living Costs Made Possible by Perfect Product.
The United States has the most abundant supply of any commodity in the world. The only one which seems to have an artificial limit is the ratio of its production to its consumption. It is developed in that permitting students and traveling men to vote white away from home. The other three are sure to be followed by a complete reversal of the returns.
