Meat's Bad Break.
 High society has its crude parentage. It is a story in one of the magazines is true. At a dinner given to the famous pianist, J. List, his host, Count Lodge, right in the middle of List's most exquisite playing, "said in a loud voice, 'If anyone wishes to have a game of whist, there are tables in the other room.' List, says the narrator, stopped short, but as no one moved he contented himself to remain at the place. The amount of wit that had been consumed by List's host on this occasion is not stated."
