Rendezvous at Noon.

Superbly mounted though he was, the herseman rode with slack rein and apecions air of a sintessness. Suffered to select its own pace, his color of Nemport-town and out into the basking countryside, choosing a way along the eastern shore, often within sight of the Sakonnet river.

For the beauties of nature in general Capt. Donald Parr cared no snap of his fingers; his thoughts, like his heart, were exclusively centered upon one true to the flight of time, were alike misleading; he had a most particular goal in paind, and secretly was in the maddent haste to arrive at it. Lastly, his interest in the charming views was positively in; but his interest in makenus.
