THE MARBLES.
"The Marbles," said Daddy, "had been very proud of late because they had been used so much by Boys and Girls—especially by Boys.
"Then, too, the Elves had played marbles as years before had they and they thought they were lots of fun to play with."
"You are nothing but an ordinary Marble!" said one large and very blue Marble.
"But I am useful for playing, and I joggle along and roll much better than you do. You are so big. You are queer and about ten times as big."
"I'd feel pretty badly," said the big Marble, "if I were as cheap as you. You cost next to nothing. In fact, you didn't even cost a cent. Not one whole cent!"
"The Marble rolled along a little way as if he couldn't be too near the cheap Marbles. Just think, you'll admire me when they see me. And the children will want to trade everything they have for me! I'm so big and round and fat. And my color is so fine. And I cost five cents."
"I've heard you say so before," said the little Marble.
"It's true, saying over and over again when it's such an amount," said the big Marble.
"Hush," said the little Marble, "the children are coming. I hear their voices."
"My Master only bought me yesterday," said the big Marble. "His friends have taken me to the store. I trade everything for me! Gracious! they'd trade dozens of little Marbles just for me! I cost five cents!"
"The children had arrived. They trade everything for me!" said the big Marble. "The Marbles almost seem to hurry into playing," said the Master of the big Marble. "They were ready for us!"
And then the children began to play. They admired the big Marble first of all, and how proud the big Marble was!

"They played and they played."
"But they did not seem to want to trade everything for it! One of them said, "It is a beauty, but then it is not nearly so nice to play with as the smaller ones, besides, if I gave up a big one, I would be sorry that big one. I'd never be able to have a real game."
"And all the other children said just the same thing."
"They played and they played. But the big Marble was so mad that it rolled away crookedly and no one thought so much of it."
"After the children had finished playing and had taken their marbles, and after the Master of the big Marble had put away with the smaller ones, the little Marble which had been bought with four others for a cent, said, "Well, you may be handsome and big. But you are not nearly such fun as we are. Sometimes the cheap things are the most fun. It doesn't matter how cheap you cost five cents that you can give such pleasure."
"The girl I met said that the big Marble was just like me. I am too big. I am too fat. I am too fine for little Marbles, anyway."
"But all the little Marbles were happy and had the best of the children's games."
