NEWS TO EVASAGO; "CLEVERLAND"

NEWBERRY VILLAGE SHOWS THE MARVELOUS DEVELOPMENT UPPER MICHIGAN HAS ACCOMPLISHED IN TWO DECADES

THIS PLEASANT, PROSPEROUS "SPOTLESS TOWN" NOW THRIVES IN MIDST OF RICH FARM LANDS WHERE ONLY FORESTS FLOURISHED BEFORE

The following article appeared in The Detroit Free Press of Sunday: Two score years ago that vast territory north of the Straits of Mackinac was a wilderness, rich beyond the dreams of a Monte Cristo in nickel and timber wealth, as yet undeveloped, but rich in an agricultural potency at which even the hardy pioneers never conceived. Today the Upper Peninsula is still a seemingly inhospitable store of iron and copper. The timber is by no means played out. But the agricultural wealth is beginning to come into its own—and wider farmers are there can no wilderness.

The development of Upper Michigan—"Cleverland" they are beginning to call it since millions of blades of grass are growing now where none grew before—is almost past the belief of those who can only take the word of the pioneers as to what conditions were before. But listening to those pioneers and looking about, one has convincing testimony. And ever the marvel grows.

The village of Newberry, official seat of the county of Lake, is typical of the whole of "Cleverland."

Thirty-seven years ago there was no Newberry—no wide-avenued, green-lawned, boulevard-lined town, so slick and span and polished that it reminds one of the freestone rubbed ready for Sunday school. There was just a mark on a rule map—a surveyor's plan of a railroad which showed the present site of Newberry as the place where iron ore could more profitably be brought to the wood that was the raw material of the iron. That was the site of the crews of the hard-labored "navies" were pushing through Cleverland's first railroad.

The Naming of Newberry. The town just a name before it actually came into existence—before it was a town in honor of John S. Newberry, of Detroit, father of Truman H. Newberry, secretary of the Navy under President Roosevelt and commander of the Ohio naval district and Republican candidate for United States senator in Newberry, sent with his associates, was contributing his quota to the future welfare of the Upper Peninsula and the state of Michigan. He was the first to build the first railroad. The names of the other directors of the company had been given to other spots on the surveyor's map. It was his turn here.

Thus, when the construction train had pushed through to the north and the carpenters were constructing a rough pine-clad depot with the location of the Vulcan iron furnace sketched out a few yards away, Newberry, Michigan, became a reality. A few shacks sprang up around the depot. Lumberjacks and iron workers came from the south. A hardy transient or two established a store and a lodging house. Eventually trains came from the north bearing the rich Lake Superior ore. That was "told" in from the surrounding forests. The finance went into operation and the saw mill began tearing through the logs. The town was established.

Despite the evidence of mineral and timber wealth, Newberry was not founded as a prospective wealth-producing city. The founders were more public-spirited citizens than that. They saw farther ahead; into good America can take no more land. This looked so hopeless with its almost impenetrable matings of forest trees, this whole eastern and central section of Upper Peninsula wilderness was conquered with the idea that something it would become the rich farming land it is today.

A Task for a Giant. John S. Newberry and his associates of the old days were given a task of land by the state as their reward for building that first railroad, the old Detroit, Mackinac & Marquette. To run 125 miles from St. Ignace to Marquette harbor. The land was thin and heavily timbered and was heavily in others—but it was all swamp; a broad belt running northwest through the natural water drainage north country. Cleared and drained, it was certain to become a veritable garden, but the clearing and draining was such a task as only a business giant would undertake.

And thus Newberry, Michigan, stands today as the best illustration of these visions of public welfare that grew and were nurtured in the minds of John S. Newberry and his fellow-pioneers as they literally, hewed their way through the jungle of the north. The village sits, smiling and content, in the position of a beautiful, fertile and productive field of green. She thrives and expands under the stimulus of her furnace and sawmill and chemical and flooring plants, and under the many strokes of her Lake Superior ore.

Modern and Prosperous. Every house—and there are some pretentious brick and stone structures—has a wide lawn carpeted with green grass. There is a big, shining new brick and stone high school building and a new city hall, and a new city park, two ordinary city blocks, a smaller, frame ward school and a handsome courthouse and sheriff's residence. The fact that the village is a municipally owned park with as much natural beauty, save water, as Belle Isle, Detroit. And there are churches, and a new city hall and other buildings of brick where frame structures formerly stood, and a plentiful sprinkling of private garages back of the residences. Every other evidence of a thoroughly modern, prosperous town. Newberry today boasts 2,500 inhabitants, exactly 2,500 more people than it had before the railroad came and had stopped the possibilities of Cleverland. Lake county has approximately 100,000 people, and more are coming every year. It attracted the attention of the state, besides its chief industry, the village has one of the largest hard-wood logging mills in the world. The Newberry State Hospital is situated a mile south.

The people will never allow the possibility of the fact that they are the existence of their village to the streets are named in honor of various members of the Newberry family, such as John, Edwin, Horlet, Parakee, Phelps, Robinson, and Charles, and it is a forcible reminder of President Roosevelt's cabinet member to stand on the "Newberry" boulevard between "Handy" street and "Sherry" avenue.
