Demobilization Comedy.

Queer things happen in demobilization, remarks a writer in the London Evening Standard. For example, here is the case of Smith and Brown. Brown is the head of the "showman business." Smith is his employee. Brown applies successfully for the discharge of Smith as a "ship" man. But his own application on the ground of "showmanship business" was disregarded. Thus Smith is at liberty without a job; Brown, who had a job to offer him, is still in khaki.

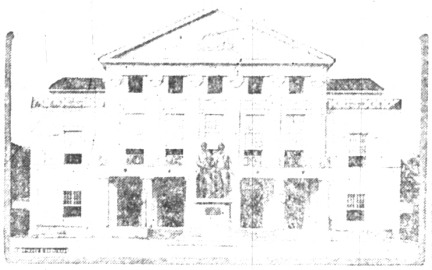
The ATHENS of GERMANY



The National Theater, Weimar.

WEIMAR, the little city which is the capital of the duchy of Saxe-Weimar, and which was selected the most appropriate place for the German national assembly, has long been denominated the "Athens of Germany." It stands for what was the best in German life. For Weimar was once a great capital in the world of letters, second if thicker many of the finest traditions and traditions of the German many that was.

Goethe and Schiller reposed among the German poets lived and died there. Some of the finest compositions of Liszt and Mendelssohn were conceived in Weimar. In this quaint old town Schopenhauer dwelt in the unutterable gloom that permeates his philosophy. To its restful solitude and its greatest memories came Nietzsche, apostle of dreadfulness, to die. And it drew George Eliot, Thackeray, Bayard Taylor, and many other notables of other lands who sought inspiration in this spot which had lured the immortals of an earlier day, records the Kansas City Star.

Where Famous Women Lived.

Weimar it was which produced two of the best remembered of German women, the Grand Duchess Anna Amalie, whose efforts gave Germany its first real standing in art and letters, and Charlotte von Stein the gifted, brilliant woman whom Goethe loved long and in vain. All Germany has laid homage at the feet of Duchess Anna Amalie. And of Charlotte von Stein it has been said that no other woman, not even Dante's Beatrice or Petrarch's Laura, has been so loved in song.

All the glory of Weimar belongs to the time before the present. Such militarist and materialist. With the ascendancy of the Hohenzollerns and the elevation of force and greed above the things of the mind and spirit Weimar faded into a background memory. Its selection by the new government as a seat for deliberation may serve to bring back to it some of its departed glory.

The beginning of Weimar's great times came about 1756, when Anna Amalie, niece of Frederick the Great, won there as a bride of the duke. She summoned Wieland poet and student, to act as tutor for her boys. Three years later young Goethe went to Weimar. Others followed. Herder, the poet, musician and critic; Bode, the translator of Sterne and Cervantes; Knebel, the classicist; Corona Schroter, the brilliant and beautiful actress and singer; Herder, the preacher poet and father of German folk song, and finally Schiller who eventually was to take rank with Goethe.

Goethe the Master There.

The names of Goethe and Schiller dominate Weimar. The former lived in the town fifty-six years. He was all things to Weimar, the adviser of its rulers, architect of its chief structures, dictator of its thought, and finally its greatest and best loved memory. His house on the Goethe Plata is one of the town's "sights," and monuments of him occupy the most prominent positions. Even his garden house has been preserved in reverent memory.

An indication of the way in which Goethe was regarded in old Weimar is gleaned from an oft told incident. The poet coveted the house that later was to be his. Its owner would not sell to him, however. So Duke Karl August went forth one day and unceremoniously took charge of the house.

"But me no buts," he replied to the reluctant owner. "Goethe wants it and we must give it to him or we shall not keep him."

The thousands of letters the adoring Goethe wrote to Charlotte von Stein all are kept in the building that houses the Goethe and Schiller archives. For ten years he paid devoted court to her but she was the wife of another man and, although she valued the homage of this man, who was one of the handsomest and most distinguished in Europe, it is generally believed that she did not in any way return his affections.

Carlyle's Tribute to Schiller.

Schiller's old home has been bought by the town and converted into a museum. His rooms are almost as he left them, the floors bare, the ceiling low and the furniture scanty, plain and almost primitive. Of this place Carlyle has written:

"When can pious scholars' footsteps cease to seek out the poor dwelling of Schiller, where he lived and labored, and was cheered by the love of his wife and children? Not for centuries, we hope. Here was no palace, no splendor, not even any comfort; only the simplest shelter, food and clothing, and these hardly in sufficient measure. Yet this was a happy home; here was true wedded love, and wherever this is, there is the divine essence of all blessedness, and the poorest hut is changed into a temple of the Graces, and the lowest of stalls is rendered sacred. The house of Schiller will long be looked to as a holy place, and the little room where he died, and the humble bedroom where he slept, and the very chair he sat in, will be visited as long as any memorial of him remains. For the life of a man like this is a possession for all men, and the light of his pure soul will shine on after ages, and help to purify and bless them. Thus do the sufferings and the strivings of great souls work for all souls; and the poorest and humblest of us may be called to heroism and martyrdom, and in the depths of poverty and weakness learn the highest lessons of human life. Such is the mystery of life, which we all participate in, and which only in rare moments we recognize. Happy is he who in any measure has learned to know it, and to feel that, however dimly, he is a debtor to all who have gone before him in this divine school, and that the best way he can discharge his debt is to show himself worthy of his inheritance, and faithfully hand on the sacred fire to his successors. The boor Schiller, who could not spell, and wrote his plays on coarse brown paper, has taught us this; and the humble house in the Schillergasse, with its tattered relics, is a holier place than many that are visited with more ceremony. It is the cottage of a poet; and the poet's soul still dwells there, and will dwell there for ages, for it is a soul that belongs to all men, and is the property of no age or country, but of all ages and countries. The Globe Tavern, where the literary men used to dine, is no more; but the house itself remains, and long may it remain! Its low entrance, its arrow-like staircase, its wainscoted parlors, and homely chambers, are all unaltered since Schiller's time. The very tavern bill, framed and glazed, hangs there as he left it. Let the place be sacred; let it be kept as it is, and treated as the holy ground of genius. Here, in truth, is the soil from which all our literature has grown; and whoever would understand it, or the men who have created it, must not neglect to visit this little room, where the seed germ of so much lies buried. Here, as in a hallowed grave, the mighty dead of our nation sleep, and from it will arise, in the hearts of all who know its history, a spirit of pilgrimage, which, we trust, will long endure among us. Let the poor Schiller's dust be undisturbed; let the house remain sacred to his memory; and let it be a refuge for the weary and the sorrowful, as it has been for many a noble heart before."

NOT MATTER OF KNOWLEDGE

Person May Be Thoroughly Conversant With Facts, and Yet Remain Ignorant.

Some people think that ignorance is merely an accumulation of facts. But that hypothesis reveals a lack of appreciation. Ignorance of any store that knowledge is not concerned with facts. It is carried quite largely with feeling, and feeling is the product of one's general intelligence.

The Hun had plenty of facts at their disposal, but they were ignorant. Their feeling was not intelligently distributed over certain areas of the individual consciousness.

This is true, more or less, of us. Dr. Thomas L. Masson writes in the Outlook. While we are right upstairs, it is easy to succeed downstairs in the office. Success is easy to those who have not brought up carefully their habits and statistics are of little use. But here is truly important in the science of living developed in the feeling that character started with one's family.

To favor knowledge of a particular thing or subject to the condition out and with it, as such a matter that does not bring has been stressed about.

We acquire knowledge largely by experience and meditation. But the thing we are learning about must impose itself upon us in such a way that we are forced to understand it through our feelings and not our minds.

There is nothing for [illegible] than character. It must be begun by a standstill. We have done this to the Huns. We must now engender our moral courage by beginning that individual with small things.

Carriage Day and Motor Way.

A slight snow fall is always enough to draw a crowd of horse drivers to the outdoor lessons of the fashionable riding schools in how to get in and out of a carriage, says New York Evening Post. It was before the motor era rampant, but even then there were mortifications of disappointment and abasement from the social student's looking up the record. The performance was by no means confined to riders who didn't have to be taught such things in public away from home. What a change today. A young woman is instructed how to run her car, but not how to get in and out of it, hampered by the fact that she may show what were once known as trim little ankles and sprightly feet. The little roadster and its off and away before her grandmother could have adjusted her skirts prior to placing the proper foot in the proper way on the carriage step.

Ill-Assorted Volumes.

"The stage manager of this theater is a stickler for details. Now every book in that bookcase on the stage is a real volume."

"So it seems, but it's a rather poor collection to be found in the library of a man who is supposed to be a scientist. By using my glasses I note that one of those volumes is a cook book, a cook book and another is a housekeeper directory for 1905."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

The Idea.

"I see where in Cologne the German soldiers are mending the shoes of the American troops."

"That does not their realizations on a different footing, doesn't it?"

Placed Correctly.
