"We had better sign the treaty," he said, "but I don't want to." This was the attitude of the German government towards the peace treaty as of Friday, June 20, when the review was written. It was marked by a sense of uncertainty and indecision. The German government was in a difficult position, having just seen the collapse of the Schiedemann cabinet and the formation of a new one. The new cabinet, headed by Philipp Scheidemann, was known for its more moderate views, but it was still uncertain as to whether it would sign the treaty.

More than half a million, and the larger part of these are concentrated in the West. The German people were not only weary of the war, but they were also weary of the peace. They had seen the horrors of the war, and they were now seeing the horrors of the peace. They were tired of the fighting, and they were tired of the fighting. They were tired of the fighting, and they were tired of the fighting.

The resignation of Philipp Scheidemann had been a great blow to the German government. Scheidemann had been one of the most prominent figures in the German government, and his resignation had created a great vacuum. The new cabinet, headed by Philipp Scheidemann, was known for its more moderate views, but it was still uncertain as to whether it would sign the treaty.

The Turkish peace mission was received informally by the committee at the Quai d'Orsay and its members set forth the Turkish situation. They asserted that Turkey was forced into the war by the Young Turks, the former German emperor and Russia's desire to grab Constantinople and that the Turkish people were not responsible for the war. They also stated that the Turkish people were not responsible for the war, and they were not responsible for the war.

The work opened with the great news of the successful nonstop flight across the Atlantic by Captain Alcock and Lieutenant Brown in the Vickers Vimy. This was a great achievement, and it was a great achievement. It was a great achievement, and it was a great achievement. It was a great achievement, and it was a great achievement.

There was some improvement in the bolshevik situation and consequently less apprehension on the part of the peace conference. A national congress of Hungarian soviets, over which Bela Kun presided, appointed a Russian plenipotentiary to Hungary and Russia in their "resolution for liberty." The progress of the Hungarian communist troops against the Czechs and Romanians was checked, and a renewed blockade by sea. Before the week end the British grand fleet was on a war footing. The immense fleet was on a war footing, and it was on a war footing.

Meanwhile, the allied nations, taking no chances, made every preparation to enforce their action in case of rejection of the treaty. They had a large force of troops, and they had a large force of troops. They had a large force of troops, and they had a large force of troops. They had a large force of troops, and they had a large force of troops.

The allied command estimated the available German forces at not more than 100,000 men. This was a great achievement, and it was a great achievement. It was a great achievement, and it was a great achievement. It was a great achievement, and it was a great achievement.
