MERRIETTA'S LETTER

In the narrative she turned on the veranda and ask one youngster to do all the walking and she to do. He started to skip around the room, and as she increased the speed of the music he accordingly began to run, and later started pacing like a big heavy horse, raising his feet away up into the air. It did not take him a moment to know what to do, she had trained them to listen so closely to her time. Front of the class, it makes no sense of the little boy in the reading class who, it seems, can not learn to read without a little house being played with each sentence and then immediately he grasps what is before him. Did any one ever hear of anything so funny as that? And to think that the teacher or found just what he needed was one of the very small boys who was used to recite Mother Goose rhyme and he leaped "I tant, I have a told in my head." Even the teacher showed she was amused that time. Oh, they did words more things before they were asked to clean up their seats and promptly get ready to go home, but this has been so frequently, but just a few more sentences, and tell you how darling they all looked when they marched out into the cloak room for their wraps. See if you can picture that little line of march, come with long floppy hats and button brown collars, and I am sure with what they were wearing all down the sides, and nice, good looking, well kept up, well dressed, over aprons with blue bordered handkerchiefs pinned to them and naughty little eyes with winking, half-closed eyes, and mischievous girls wearing tight, shiny pug-tails and black hair bows. Well, they went and I had one good laugh and I don't know whether it was because of my hearty laughter, or just what, but I found several "trap" bears come straggling in, and I thought because I felt so awfully happy.

Good bye, Roseanna, Dear for now, Marnetta.
