"DANGER! DANGER!"

Drummond was tapping his left leg with his hand, save for nothing had happened. And yet ten minutes before a carefully planned coup had failed at the instant of success.

CHAPTER III. In Which Things Happen in Half Moon Street.

High Drummond folded up the piece of paper he was studying and nothing had happened. And yet ten minutes before a carefully planned coup had failed at the instant of success.

CHAPTER III—Continued.

"Compensate your electric meter to himself, standing on the hall staircase, had resumed his usual composition.

The Humorous Thing Is That Haven't an Idea Who the Girl Is

Drummond grimaced. The humorous thing is that I haven't an idea who the girl is. I have only a name, and she is only a name.

"No, No," He Muttered, "Not Again."

"No, No," he muttered, "not again." The devil there is! he remarked. "The game has begun in earnest."

think we are at home. I want you to remain within call, and under no circumstances let our next visitor of your sight for more than a minute. In fact, I think you'd better sit in the room.

At length he replaced the wrong in his pocket-book and rang the bell. "James," he remarked as his servant came in.

"You're such an aggressive young man, Captain Drummond—and I fear, not very tactful." "I regret I may have to be a little more so."

"Where have you hidden Potts?" "I don't know," he answered. "I don't know where I hid him."

"No, No," he muttered, "not again." "The devil there is!" he remarked. "The game has begun in earnest."

"Still the same delusion, I see?" "The same delusion," repeated Drummond. "I shall be able to receive both the paper and the man up till six o'clock tonight at 32A Berwick street."
