Personalities vs. Water

BY GEORGE R. AVERILL

"Personality." says Webster, "is that which constitutes distinction of person; individuality." He goes on to say, "something said or written which refers to the person, conduct, etc., of some individual, especially something of a disparaging or offensive nature, personal remarks; at, indulgence in personalities."

The Wizard of Words, in another place in his immortal book, states that water is "the fluid which descends from the clouds in rain, and which forms rivers, lakes, eas, etc." He probably includes underground water supplies.

For the convenience of the people of Birmingham I have quoted Webster on these two words—two words that are quited importance to us today.

For the first we have not much interest, except where it interferes with the latter. What we want in this town is WATER—and we don't need to use the word "dam' (n)" to get it, neither in word or engineering service.

It's a plain, everyday businsses proposition with us, this buying of water. Pretty soon we shall decide what we want done about it. We, the people, are the ones to choose. But we'd like to have they various phases of solution to our water shortage placed before us in a businessifike manner, free from any attempt to show a relationship between the two words defined.
