This man was not a genius. He had his faults, for he was homan. He had his good points, for he was homan. He had his good points, for he was human. He had achieved a position higher than is reached by most men, it is true, but not simply because he was a clean-minded, honest and sincere man. Comparatively few people in these United States have ever seen him, fewer have heard his spoken word.

While European society isn't as exclusive as it used to be, still it doesn't hold open house for every American that goes over there to visit. Mr. Coursens must have realized this, and hit upon the happy scheme of putting up a cry for 5 per cent beer in Michigan under the guise that in doing so he was speaking the minds of the guise that in doing so he was speaking the minds of the guise that in doing so he was speaking the minds of the guise that in doing so he was speaking the minds of the guise that he idn't smile to himself, for the scheme, worked fine. There is a man who has just taken his family to Europe. A few months ago he was an obsurity as far as national or international profinence; was concerned. Of course he had held down the Mayor's chair in Detroit, and he was recognized, and he had put the street railway system of Detroit in a sorry mess, and he is at present one of Michigan's senators. But all this didn't carry his home state, nor did it cause many newspaper services to broadcast his pictures. And he wanted to take his family to Europe.
