The Blind Man's Eyes By William MacHarg Edwin Balmer

THE TELEGRAM Gabriel Warden, Seattle capital of the world, was a man of a caliber to be admitted without question. He looked like a man of danger that threatened him if he were not.

CHAPTER III—Continued. "You mean," the sentence, obnoxious, was one she felt it better not to finish.

Neither spoke, as he went with her into the next car, and at the section where her father sat, and he heard, silently, nodded to Avery, who coldly returned his nod, and left her.

How near he had come to talking to this girl about himself, even though he had felt from the first that that was what he was trying to make him do! Was he losing his common sense?

CHAPTER IV Are You Hillward? The bell in the washroom at the end of the car was ringing violently, and someone was rattling its ring with a stout iron call for "Porter."

Yes, yes! "I'll fall on my still!" "Yessuh, and snow some more, suh!" "But haven't we the plow still ahead?" "Oh, yessuh; the plow's ahead. We still got it; but that's all, eh. It ain't no' much; it's hoisted."

It is always a growing concern Impossible to Set Boundaries That Shall Confine the Growth of the English Language.

William Shakespeare's vocabulary was about 15,000 words. John Milton needed only 1,000 different words for "Paradise Lost," while the Old Testament has fewer than 6,000 different words. Some people use only about 2,000 to 3,000. A few years ago some peasants in rural England, farm laborers, found words for use in their dialect.

appreciated for the first time that his own had interrupted a conversation—or rather a sort of monologue of complaint on the part of Standish addressed impersonally to Avery.

"That's his, is it?" the other man said. "Then go ahead!" Eaton observed that Avery, who had turned in his seat, was watching the diversion on the part of the conductor with interest.

"You look a telegram for Lawrence Hillward this morning," he asserted. "Why?" "Because it was mine, or meant for me, as I said at the time. My name is Hillward, but Mr. Hillward expected to make this trip with me."

"That's pretty good, but not quite good enough," he charged. "Conductor, get that telegram for me!" Eaton got up, controlling himself under the insult of the other's manner.

"What name? Who is that telegram?" "Mr. Lawrence Hillward." "Oh, thank you; then that's mine." "Connelly held back. 'I thought your name was Eaton.'"

"No air-train delivery." Eaton drew his curtains close again and ripped the envelope open; but before reading the message he observed with alarm that his palmia jacket had opened across the chest, and a small round scar, such as that left by a high-powered bullet, penetrating, was exposed.

"That message came through yesterday, and you were waiting for you at Simons; when we got them this morning they sent it to you." "I never set eyes on you until I saw you on this train, and you ain't my telegram!" The charge was made loudly and distinctly; every one in the dining car—Eaton could not see every one, but he knew it was so—had put down fork or cup or spoon and was staring at him.

"That's for you, to decide," Eaton said; and as though the matter was closed for him, he resumed his seat. He was aware that throughout the car the passengers were watching him curiously.

"Are you ready to go back to our car now, Harriet?" Avery inquired when she had finished her breakfast, though Eaton was not through.

"No, No! isn't this—ain't this Basil Saintone?" "TO BE CONTINUED"

Why Farmers are Turning to CHEVROLET for Economical Transportation

In 1922 Chevrolet jumped from seventh to second place in sales of all cars, and to first place in sales of fully equipped modern cars.

Purchases by farmers were the chief factor in this remarkable development. Farmers want automobiles not only of low first price, but also of low later cost for operation and maintenance.
