Eco City News

Hallow'en Social.

Last Wednesday night, while gales lurched behind telephone poles, black witches astride brooms sailed across the sky, and filly, shivery ghosts laid in waiting, a party of brave mortals met in the Bennaville avenue Community House in revelry. Pumpkins and cornucopias, orange and black decorations formed a fit and pretty setting for the fantastic, motley array of costumes worn by the group. Wicked Turks bobbed for apples with gentle puritan maidens, and foolish clowns chatted freely with proper colonial ladies.

Mrs. Albert Bottrell, of Bennaville avenue, was given a prize for wearing the most unique costume and several other prizes were awarded. Refreshments were served by the ladies of the church.

About 10:30, the party adjourned and each individual hurried homeward with many apprehensive glances at innocent shadows along the way.

Birthday Surprise Party. Saturday evening, Mr. Earl Biso surprised his wife with a delightful birthday party at their home on Emmo avenue. The house was prettily decorated with all the Hallow'en colors and the beautiful floral centerpiece was of baby mums and pineros. After dinner the evening was spent in playing games and dancing. The guests were Mrs. Charlotte Biso, Mr. and Mrs. Lyle Biso and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Alden Braithwaite, Mrs. Margaret Meno, and Harvey Kirby, of Detroit, and Mr. and Mrs. H. C. Holden and son, of Emmo avenue.

Fuller, of Birmingham, and a duet by Mrs. Young Moore, of Birmingham, who is in charge of the program.

Men Still Digging. Like true "Jerry Crunchers," the men of Eco City dig tightly by the dim light of lanterns. But it is not graves they are digging. They are excavating a cellar beneath the church and because of the enthusiasm and fine spirit that has been shown, the work has gone fast and the men expect to have it completed by the end of this week. The ladies too have done their part by serving them refreshments every night.

At the last get-together meeting of the men of Eco City, a committee of five men was appointed to see Mr. Rex Humphrey Monday night concerning the necessary opening of the street running north and south at the west end of Eco.

Little Folk's Column. GREAT-GRANDMOTHER'S BIRTHDAY.

Aunt Mary walked into the nursery and found the children still sleeping. "Why," she exclaimed, "I have forgotten this day? Have you forgotten this is great-grandmother's birthday, a 85 years old. Have you forgotten we are all going to her house to have a lovely party and have some birthday cake? I saw in the park some blue birds on them, and have some birthday cake. Come, wake up and I will tell you some of great-grandmother's stories." The children opened their eyes on a glorious morning in October. Little Jack Frost had been scattering diamonds and rubies during his travels in the night, and now, as the sun shone away remaining left on the trees sparkled and glistened like diamonds.

"Aunt Mary, Aunt Mary, tell us about when great-grandmother was a little girl," they cried in one voice.

Aunt Mary sat down on the side of the bed to tell them.

"Long ago when great-grandmother was only a little girl like Jean, she lived with her parents in a faraway country, miles away from any town where there were any Blacks that caused her father a great deal of trouble, because they would come at night and steal the sheep and cattle, and very often the dogs belonging to the Blacks would drive the sheep off the hillside from the farmstead, killing numbers of them besides."

The nearest neighbors lived 20 miles away and one day when they were at dinner, these neighbors drove to the farmstead, in a great hurry, telling great-grandmother's father that the Blacks were traveling that way in large numbers. This made everyone feel afraid, for until then they were never there would not know whether the Blacks were friendly or not. The large sheep's body which hung on a tall gum tree outside the kitchen was rung, which brought all the help running out, but they were only dead in time of trouble. Great preparations were made to barricade the flock and many feet close to the house.

Great-grandmother only had one sister and they stood and watched these preparations with their arms around each other almost afraid to move. After what seemed a very long time to everyone they heard the tramp of many feet close to the house. The men peering out saw very much to their surprise, Old Tom, the black man who had worked for them for years, talking to the chief of the tribe, which meant that they did not mean to do any harm in any way. Great-grandmother's father later found out from Old Tom, that they were traveling to miles across country to join another tribe in a marriage feast. The chief was wearing a crown and had a sword for them to come. They always had a feast a wedding or a funeral which lasted for three days in either case.

"Your great-grandmother," said Ellen, her eyes wide, "I am sure she was a very brave girl, though the Blacks were friendly."

"Oh, Aunt Mary," Jack exclaimed, "well, about the time when great-grandmother fell in the creek when she went fishing with her father?"

"No, Jack, this is enough for one day. We must all hurry now and drive to go over to great-grandmother's and give her the best party she has ever had, to make up for the time when she did not have parties for a little girl, for there were no children there to have parties with."

In a short time they were dressed and hurrying over to great-grandmother's to give her her birthday kisses, telling her they thought she was the best great-grandmother in the world. Very soon other grandchildren arrived and were clamoring around the old lady giving her the gifts they had brought and begging her to tell the stories of her childhood which to them sounded much better than any they ever read in their story books, because they were true.

But this was great-grandmother's birthday and she was so busy having the best party she had ever had, she could not tell them stories that day, but she promised to tell Jack the story of the fishing trip how she fell in the creek, the very next time they came to see her.
