A VELVET SURPRISE
Daisy was a little girl of six years and lived with her parents in a lovely place on the Harbor in South Africa. As there were no other children living near, her chief playmate was a young boy named "Trot," and sometimes they would play and roam away quite a long distance from home every week.

One afternoon Trot and Daisy had played in the yard and Trot had done a very good job. Daisy was surprised she saw on the side of a hill very far away, a very large animal which seemed almost black in color and was covered with long shaggy hair.

These baboons go about in companies and when they stop to eat, a few of them will cry very loudly and when they see any one should surprise the others while they are eating. If they see the others who act as sentinels become too old to keep watch carefully, they are thrown away from the flock by the leader.

They were walking along a very narrow track and in the distance, in the same line of the road there were some bright orange flowers growing. Daisy wanted them, though her mother thought it would be better if she kept to the road on the way home.

Walking around a thorn bush, she suddenly saw sitting on the path, an old baboon. She thought it must be the one she had seen before and did not know what to do. She ran to go on and she was afraid to turn back.

Finally she decided to creep toward the road taking care to go behind some bushes. When she had reached a place level to the Baboon, she looked around to see what he was doing and to her surprise there was a large stone, which on one side looked just like a big monkey.

Who? Daisy found out her mistake, she did not like to own up even to herself how very much afraid she had been. But she ran the rest of the way home, and when she was once more safe, she told her mother what a fright she had had, and leading her never wander off again alone.

But they were all very glad to find out the Baboon story was only a large stone.

Your Foot-Candles

ANY storekeeper will acknowledge, without a hesitation or qualification, that good lighting is one of the most important elements in the display and sale of goods.

Most storekeepers think their own store is well lighted. Yet survey shows that over 70 percent of retail stores, of all classes, are poorly lighted and are undoubtedly losing business in consequence.

Do you actually know that your store is adequately lighted? Do you know whether you are using 5-foot-candle illuminations of 14 or 15? It is very important for you to know. Call for one of our engineers to measure your light. This service will cost you nothing.

Two Shows - 7 and 8:45

Old Austin Hibbard, an old miser who won wealth at the expense of others, at last faces a man who has grown up to demand a square deal. After an argument the old man attempts to strike the younger man with a cane. Stannard, the youth, in defending himself, shoves the old man who stumbles and strikes his head on the floor. A neighbor, nearly as bad a scoundrel as the old man, sees the incident and while Stannard is gone from the room getting some water, he climbs through the window and seizes the money lying on the table. The old man awakes in time to see him and the neighbor kills him to prevent being exposed. Stannard is accused of the crime. How a beautiful and charming girl by her faith and persistent effort finally frees the youth and sends the real criminal to prison provides thrills and entertainment of an unusual kind. Also a good Sunshine Comedy
