History Repeats Itself in Local Episode Of Greenwood Cemetery By Helen V. Walker. Something of the same spirit that welled in the hearts of our famous first President, George Washington, after the cherry tree and hatchet episode, is evident in our own little community in Birmingham. No cherry tree enters into this case but the same consciousness provides the plot for both the cherry tree tale and the local parallel.

forward with accusations, quite in the manner that the head of the Washington household did. There was no direct mention of names made. But the fact was revealed through the columns of the Eccentric that "some boys" were laying waste to the glassware in the cemetery and destroying things generally, quite in the manner that Mr. Washington probably announced "some boys" been chopping too enthusiastically at my best cherry tree.

Next day the sexton in Greenwood cemetery was startled when he found a half grown boy in a breathless state rushing at him in the cemetery. When he recovered he was financially one dollar poorer. In his hand was a rather scintillatingly written note.
