MATHESON NAMED COMPANY OFFICIAL

Former Oakland Motor Head Occupies Vice Presidency of Kelvinator Inc.

C. W. Matheson of Birmingham, former vice president of the Oakland Motor Car company, is active today as vice president and general sales manager of the Kelvinator, Inc., according to announcement made by A. H. Goss, president of the Electric Refrigeration corporation.

For many years, Mr. Matheson has been identified with the automobile industry. During 10 years with Dodge Bros., he was directly connected at one time or another with every division of its sales operations. From 1920 to 1922 he was general sales manager there, and during his last two years with Dodge Bros. he was vice president in charge of sales.

Upon leaving Dodge Bros., Mr. Matheson became assistant to Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., president of the General Motors corporation, finally becoming vice-president and sales manager of the Oakland Pontiac division of General Motors, where he is said to have set up a new sales record in the industry.

Self-Torture Practised in U.S.

While the sect of self-torturers, known as Penitentes, has ceased to exist in European countries it still flourishes in a portion of New Mexico, mostly among the Pueblo Indians. The picture shows a Penitente mission, at Taos, N. M., in which the rites of the sect are practised.

Her Faith Reborn

By Katherine Edelman

(The story of a woman who had lost the greatest thing in life—faith in her fellowmen—and how it came back to her at Christmas time.)

HULDA POTTSFIELD was very unhappy. For two months she had fretted herself because a sum of money which she had invested had been lost. She had entrusted it to an old friend of her girlhood in a nearby city, and when the news came that the money was lost Hulda made up her mind then and there that all humanity was alike—eager to cheat its own friends if there was a chance. She grew more bitter and sullen each day and withdrew herself almost entirely from the circle of friends that she had known so long. She never stopped to think that even without this amount she could still live in comparative ease; that there was nothing in reason she would have to deny herself, as the income she still had was quite large. Blindly she shut her eyes to all this and would not allow herself to think of her many blessings or to frame even the slightest excuse for the friend who had failed.

Now, with Christmas approaching, she grew even more bitter than usual. "I'm not going to do a single thing this year," she repeated to herself over and over. Why should I, anyway, after my great loss?"

So when the Ladies' Aid called for an offering for the annual entertainment and Christmas baskets to be given to the poor she was ready with her answer. But when they left hurriedly after her curt refusal she was more unhappy than ever. "No one seems to have any sympathy for my great misfortune," she wailed to herself. "What a cruel world it is; no one seems to care."

The window where she sat brooding opened out on Arbor street. Soon after the Ladies' Aid left she looked out to see that some one was coming up the steps. This time it was a young girl, and Hulda sniffed to herself as she saw her. "Another who comes seeking," she said under tightened lips.

But the young girl who entered had not come begging. Instead, she had come to tell Hulda that she was the daughter of the man to whom Hulda had entrusted her money and that she had heard that Hulda was in need—that her loss had left her stranded. Her father had been ill for several months, crushed by the failure of his hopes, all of which was due to the treachery and deceit of his partner in business. He was now better and things were beginning to look brighter. There was every hope that no one would lose a dollar. In the meantime the girl came to offer Hulda some money from her own savings—she was private secretary to some big man in the city.

After the girl left Hulda sat huddled in her chair. God! how selfish she had been—how blind—how ungrateful! Great tears trickled slowly down her cheeks, tears that carried away forever the bitterness and selfishness that had been in her heart of late. The world, after all, was a wonderful place and its people were wonderful people!

Making her way to the phone, she picked it up with hands that trembled and called for the president of the Ladies' Aid.

Human benefactors work in diverse ways for their fellow men, giving their time, their talents or their money as fancy or necessity dictates. Some even give their blood, as Raymond Briez of Paris has done no less than 101 times in transfusions to save the lives of others, without accepting a single franc in payment. His benefactions have covered a period of five years, he being but 29, and a petition has been presented by grateful countrymen who desire that he be admitted to the Legion of Honor.

A most unusual fish story which, strangely enough, is absolutely true, comes from San Francisco, where John A. Ewen, a stone-cutter, uncovered with his chisel the fossil of a 10-inch prehistoric fish embedded in a block of limestone. Dr. George D. Hanna, paleontologist, identified the specimen as a ganoid, now extinct for many thousands of years, and has placed it on exhibition at the Academy of Sciences.

It is estimated that 10,000 parishes in France are now without priests.
