

town being the county seat, he came there one day and talked. "This was not one of the debates with Douglass. He was alone to the best of my memory. He rode into town on a horse that was too small for him, and his feet dangled below the stirrups. There were few railroads in the state then and people had to get about the best way they could. He wore a dark shawl which took the place of an overcoat in those days.

"A large crowd, mostly farmers, had gathered in the courthouse yard to hear him speak, of about 1000 to hear him speak. Of course, the were all watching him.

while he was watching him curiously and to assemble he saw an old farmer that he knew, and took him off to one side for a visit. He waited for a ped up on a fence post, utterly preconscious of our interest. He was pleasant, an interesting, and a good speaker, and an interesting teller. He talked sensibly and with the impression of being a very intelligent man.

He was called "Hot" (1941).

that time, though he didn't tell his followers were told when that he was going to be President.
