

Hyperbolically Enunciating, Praised Be Alex, King of a Few

In almost any good book on grammar there is a chapter devoted to the explanation of certain figures of speech, such as hyperbole, irony, etc. Mighty nice things to know about and especially if you know how to use them. In case you are one of those who want to look them up, the following examples are given.

Alex Groves believes that each state department should function according to the best advantage of the citizenry.

He is a staunch advocate of democracy as opposed to aristocracy.

He believes that no man should hold office over one term.

Everybody under the governor is supposed to change to give expression to individual ability and initiative.

Money means nothing in the life of Alex Groves.

Money means absolutely nothing in the life of Alex Groves.

The governor of Michigan would not make a good business man; he never is as aggressive.

Alex Groves is a second Abraham Lincoln.

He never passes the buck.

Alex Groves is the father of his nation, father, not king.

He believes that no man should hold office over one term.

Everybody under the governor is supposed to change to give expression to individual ability and initiative.

Money means nothing in the life of Alex Groves.

Money means absolutely nothing in the life of Alex Groves.

Police News In the Springtime a young man's "finny turns to spirits" may be the solution to the cause of many arrests made in the city during the last week. The legal charge made against eleven offenders in Judge Luck court this last week was just ordinary "drunk," but this is to be a term to apply to eleven happy, carefree, ebriated men.
