GIRL SCOUT TROOPS TRY NEW STUNTS

Girl Scout troops here are trying a new project designed to stimulate interest in the various phases of the organization's work—that of keeping a check on the troops' activities during a six-week period, and awarding a prize to the high point winner at the end of the period.

Each member of the Girl Scout Council attends at least three troop meetings, dropping in at unexpected times. The Council member notes the program, activities, etc., and records them. At the end of the period, a troop flag will be awarded the troop having the largest number of points, and the second prize winner will be given a pennant to go with its flag.
