about the felling of the old tree there have been several interchanges, and now it is just a pile of branches and dying leaves in the street, awaiting the day that will bear it away.

One of the prettiest small estates in this district is owned by Carl A. Strand, Detroit lumber man who lives on the Adams road, about a mile north of Birmingham. Many of you have seen his winter apples.

Jack Fairburn, handsome, uncluttered, who recently moved from Detroit to Birmingham, is an ardent supporter of the laborer's efforts to induce men to include women in their organizations. That is to say, Jack has seen the ads about what women are wearing and then he said "shorts" are worthy of men's contempt; he likes to see them displayed in spots at their windows here, and he often remarks that men will soon have equal rights with the fair sex.

Monday afternoon we heard a local man agree that the spending of $12,000 more each year for lighting Woodward avenue might be a warranted attraction and convenience, and then he said that a town that could spend so much might be able to pay $5,000 for the services of a traffic expert to aid in beautifying, in practical and economical manner, the growth of the community.

Birmingham tonight is a much different aspect. They were dark and undisturbed and usually active thorough-fare appeared lonely. A burned out wire was the reason for the absence of lights and resulted in a "glow" below the street at First and Maple avenues and the village was without light in several sections for a few minutes on a hot night when the damage was repaired.
