England and Law
England still has a quaint, old-fashioned habit of showing respect for the law of the land. Sessions are closed during certain hours—including the very hours when the masses of the people are going back and forth from their work and would find drinking most agreeable. At one time after closing time it is more difficult to get a drink in London than it is to obtain bootleg liquor at any time or any place in our own land of the spree.

We went to a London variety theater for the purpose of hearing English jokes about Americans—exactly the same kind of jokes that American vaudeville performers have about the English. One monologist said:

"I have just returned from America. It's quite worth while to go to America for the pleasure of coming away. And the crowd grew almost hysterical with laughter."

It is always possible to please a large group of people by flattering them, by intimating they are superior to some other group.

One thing I like about the island called England is its definiteness. You're either on it or you are not.

When you board a boat for France and look back at the English shore at Dover or New Haven, the chalk cliffs are sliced off as if by a huge saw-cutting. England doesn't run falteringly out into the ocean as if it didn't know when to quit. There is no mistaking where England leaves off. What could be more fair?

We have just had a frank talk with an American tourist traveling with his wife.

"Two men traveling together can see twice as much as a man and his wife can," he remarked. "No matter where you're going, a woman never has the right kind of shoes on. At the last minute, before we start out to see anything, my wife always says: 'Then I'll have to go back to the room and change my shoes.'"

We tried to assure him that he was paying a small price for the privilege of traveling with so charming a woman as his wife doubtless is, but he walked away dubiously shaking his head.
