(Concluded from Page 6, Part 3) may also be taken as a trade index of the country. "The automobile is a sensitive barometer of business conditions in every territory where it is marketed in quantity," he said. That means, of course, general distribution of present wealth and a satisfactory future outlook."

DANGEROUS EMPLOYEES

When a man has an actual legitimate need for more money with which to provide the ordinary comforts of life for those near and dear to him, and if he believes he is underpaid by his employer, he may find a way to square things with his conscience for helping himself to whatever he thinks he ought to have. He is really a dangerous man to have around.

In New York a while ago, a certain young man was so brazenly frank in his attitude regarding his appropriation of funds, that he not only succeeded in keeping all the money he had stolen, but escaped all chance of punishment.

A big concern had a bookkeeper who was obliged to work long hours at low wages. This bookkeeper was bonded by a big surety company for $5,000. One day the man's employer came to the office of the head of the surety company, and told him that the bookkeeper had taken $3,000 of the firm's money. He wanted to be reimbursed under the bond. The official gave him Blank to fill out at his leisure, with the date. The next morning the bookkeeper himself appeared at the surety company's office with a rather agreeable personality, and perfectly at ease. "You won't have much respect for me," he told the official, "because I have played my employer and maliciously. I am a dishonest man. But for years I have had to work from early morn'g until 11 at night for less than I am worth. The amount I have taken just about makes up what I should have had in salary for the last 10 years. What I came to tell you, though, is this: You're not going to lose any money on my account. You won't need to pay anything on my bond. I'll see to that. Just have my employer make out the papers asking reimbursement on my bond, and then send for me. I'll guarantee you that you will not lose a cent."

The official had a sense of humor, and the situation appeared to him. He was interested in seeing it through. After the employer has signed the firm in which he had itemized the bookkeeper's shortage the bookkeeper again came on the scene and explained that the money he had taken did not belong to the firm which had bonded him at all, but was taken from the funds of a church of which his employer was treasurer. He had become disgruntled over having to work after hours on the books of the church fund without extra compensation, and decided to use part of the new rest for his own purposes. The bond covered the young man's position as bookkeeper, and not as acting treasurer of the church. So the bookkeeper went to his employer and told him: "If you attempt to collect that money from the surety company, or to have me arrested, I shall have you arrested for your own good. The surety people, and unless you make good the shortage to the church, I'll report the whole thing to the church trustees. The employer was obliged to do just that.
