LIVING IT
 "Our code of ethics is lived—not printed. I would urge every member to adopt loyalty, co-operation, team work, and fair play as his personal ideals."
 To these are encouraging words by the president of a business organization, H. T. White, head of the National Standard Parts association. It's rather an "inspirational" thing to have a code of ethics in writing. Some men's organizations have their codes printed in fancy form and framed. To live your code of ethics—that is something else.

PEEL ONIONS
 Don't say you can't find anything to do in the world. There is plenty to do but you must have a bit of ingenuity to think what it is and a bit of get-up-and-go to start doing it. Let us take a lesson from Peter Tyler, London onion peeler. Some years ago Tyler and his wife began to buy onions and re-sell them, peeled. Later he had to hire scores of folks to help him peel. He died recently, well-to-do for those parts.

NOT TOO BIG

A transcontinental train was considerably delayed at an Idaho station. A traveler walked up the main street. He saw leaves and dirt on the sidewalk in front of a certain store. It happened that the man was the owner of a chain of stores extending all over the United States. He borrowed a broom and cleaned the sidewalk in front of his store, so that the place would look attractive to possible customers. Perhaps this act reveals the chief reason why he owns a great chain of stores.

AS TO WORK

On this subject of work, one wonders why there is such a prejudice against work with the hands. Vocational guidance experts in all schools know that every young college man wants a white collar job. He wants a place in a factory unless that sort of experience is absolutely necessary to prepare him for what he wants to do later. What is it about the human being that rebels against wearing overalls if he can get anything to do in better clothes? All honest work is equally honorable, and the man willing to work with his hands, as well as with his brains, frequently can make twice as much money as a mere white collar man.

HOLDING AND PAWING

If you haven't anything to say interesting enough to keep the attention of the one you are talking to, don't try to force him into unwilling attention by holding him by the lapel, pawing him, or moving around in such a manner as to keep your face under his chin no matter which way he looks. You know the type and the style. It is all very irritating. The man who indulges in such tactics has lost his case in a hurry unless his victim is particularly easy-tempered and soft-hearted. Let's recall the words of the courtly Chesterfield: "Never hold anyone by the button or the hand in order to be heard out, for if people are unwilling to hear you, you had better hold your tongue than them."

ELOQUENCE

There is a lot which passes for eloquence which is only a fine wordiness. The only true eloquence is the kind of speaking that brings about a worthy result. No matter how fluent a man may be, if he does not really move people, stir them, inspire them to action, he is not really eloquent. Lloyd George, one of the finest public speakers in the world, says that the "finest eloquence is that which gets things done; the worst is that which delays them."

WORRY

Don't fight worry. It's no use. Worry will not be denied. You cannot pretend that you do not feel anxiety. The only way out is to face the facts that are responsible for worry and try to correct them. If the facts can't be changed, if the situation can't be corrected, you will at least find

THE GREAT

We are accustomed to think that so-called great men are of a different race. We think of them as not behaving at all after the manner of the rest of us of the rank and file. It has been said by one that men are neither so good nor so bad as we are apt to think them. There are elements of greatness in almost all men, and elements of littleness in almost all men. We will all get along comfortably if we realize that a big man is also a human being. And we may well realize that a little man is a personality that deserves some respect. Sometimes it is ignorance that keeps a man from realizing his possibilities and being really big. More often it is a cramped spirit, a lack of generosity, selfishness, ally get used to it.

VANITY

None of us should esteem vanity too lightly. Vanity makes a man want to improve his position in order to do that he strives to do well in his home town. It is honorable to wish to have people think well of us. It is proper to have self-respect and to have pride in our achievements. It is a little hard to know just where pride leaves off and vanity begins. Vanity can account for a great deal of advancement in this world.

NEWSPAPERS

The best newspaper is simply defined. It is the newspaper that contains the greatest amount of accurate information and which treats news with the greatest fairness. These two things rank in importance above its editorial opinions.
