The WORLD and All

NAVAL EXPANSION ATTACKED
By DR. NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER
President, Columbia University.

(Nicholas Murray Butler was born at Elizabeth, N. J., April 2, 1862. He received three degrees at Columbia university and later studied in Berlin and Paris. He holds 29 honorary degrees from American and European universities. He began teaching as an assistant in philosophy in 1885, and became president of Columbia in 1902, which office he has since held. His home is in New York City.)

The world is longing for leadership toward the light. It gazes steadily toward the horizon and eagerly hails each new form that rises with the star of a lofty ideal. Wilson, Masaryk, Briand, Stresemann, Chamberlain have in turn or together revealed the stature of world statesmen. "My conception of a statesman," said Disraeli in a famous speech, "is of one who represents a great idea, an idea which may lead him to power, an idea with which he may identify himself, an idea which he may and can impress on the mind and conscience of a nation." Whether the idea be one that leads quickly to power or not, is of much less consequence than that it be an idea which should lead to power and some day will.

Today that same fearful punishment awaits the nation that will not rise to its moral obligation as its brother's keeper. To appeal in support of "doctrines of moral isolation and selfishness to the text of Washington's farewell address and of Jefferson's first inaugural, against the whole purpose of their teachings and their lives, is as rational and as convincing as it would be to support by their authority the claims of the flashlight and the stage coach as instrumentalities of civilization against those of the electric current and the airship of this new and undreamt of day. No they are to assert that we are our brother's keepers and that our obligations everywhere and always go hand in hand with our advantages, our achievements and our acquisitions.

To insist on naval expansion now, with the ink of the pact of Paris hardly dry, would be worse than a travesty. It would be the most complete confession of national insincerity.

Unless all men and all governments are liars, the nations have gotten rid of the necessity of huge standing armies, powerful navies, bombing planes, stores of poison gas and the whole gospel of preparedness for a war which is promised never to be fought.

GYPSIES

Gypsies didn't interest me when I was a boy, because I was taught to fear and avoid the wandering bands that occasionally passed our way. My parents were frontier landowners, and they had little tolerance for folk who didn't even want to own land. Gypsies were quite impossible.

Later, as a newspaper reporter in Omaha, I became well acquainted with a Gypsy colony while over possession of a girl who was alleged to have been kidnapped by the Gypsies. It was proved to the satisfaction of the court that the girl was a Gypsy, and that her parents had sold her to the Gypsy colony then in possession of her. I found many customs among the Gypsies that seemed curious to me, but by that time I was old enough to realize that those who differ from us in customs are not necessarily evil.

Konrad Bercovici, in his recent book, "The Story of the Gypsies," published by Cosmopolitan Book Corporation, has done a great service to the Gypsies and to the rest of the world as well. For anyone who promotes hate and prejudice among peoples that are alien and strange to one another does service to all concerned.

The Gypsies are a very ancient people, and they are very proud of their pure Gypsy blood. I don't know just how important pride in pure blood may be. One may easily be proud of being what he is, regardless of merit. Most distinctive peoples are very proud of their unmix blood.

Bercovici tells, in an interesting manner, much that ought to be more widely known about the Gypsies. He has been with and among them in England, Hungary, Russia, Italy, Roumania, Bulgaria and elsewhere. He emphasizes the marked differences exist-
