WASHINGTON ANTICIPATES ELABORATE INAUGURAL

Washington is looking forward to a brilliant inauguration when Herbert Hoover takes the oath of office on March 4. Despite the president-elect's wish for simple ceremonies, an elaborate program is in the making. It is planned to have the dirigible Los Angeles circle the parade as it passes down Pennsylvania avenue. Above is a composite photograph of a former inaugural parade and the Los Angeles dirigible floating above it. Upper left, one of the few pictographs of Hoover in a silk hat; upper right, Maj. Gen. Charles P. Summerall, chief of staff of the U. S. Army, and grand marshal of the inaugural parade. Below, John W. Rector, 92, of Cedar county, Iowa, who knew the president-elect when he was a boy, and who is looking forward to holding Hoover's hat during the ceremonies.

Celebrates Birthday

The National Council of Women will celebrate its fortieth birthday in March with a nation-wide chain of meetings, and a conference in Washington. Dr. Valeria H. Parker, president, plans to acquaint the nation with the aims of the organization—to ally racial and religious prejudices and to foster international understanding.

Charles Beasley, half-back of a Peoria high school team, was stricken with appendicitis while making a run of 82 yards, but scored his touchdown and was operated on 20 minutes later.

Andrew Broge of Los Angeles had James Stimpert arrested at a luncheon for sneering so loudly that he was kept awake.

When "Bucky" was named manager of the Washington club a few weeks before the opening of the 1934 campaign—to succeed Bumpus, the former became the youngest pitcher in the big leagues. He stepped out and startled the baseball world his very first year as boss by giving Washington its first pennant. He topped off the season by out-generalling John J. McGraw, so-called master mind of baseball, in the world's series that followed. He had long been ranked as a brilliant second baseman—a leady ball player. And his astute leadership had long been ranked as a brilliant manager. He was, in fact, only 28 years old.

The following year, however, he surprised the baseball world by reporting—leading the Senators to victory in the league race a second time. He failed, however, in the world series that followed. This after assuming a lead of three games, with but one more needed to clinch the series. The final game of the series witnessed the tragic spectacle of Walter Johnson, whose effort to "drive in" was in vain to stem the tide of Pirates in the onslaught of the Pittsburgh team in the final game. The game was played in a sea of mud.

He became a second baseman—actually $5,000 and one ball player (Hill Davison) for Harris. He also managed to buy his batting average to around .250. In the spring of 1918 Harris joined the Buffalo club of the International league, and it was there that he made the top as an infielder that drew him a chance with the Senators in 1919. He said that Griffith gave Buffalo six

Meanwhile Harris had married. There was talk that success and social ambitions had turned his head. Regardless of the truth of this Harris did become unpopular in Washington—so much so that Griffith finally gave him an opportunity to shift for himself. Harris is not exactly a stranger to Detroit uniform. He was a member of the Tigers for some time like a month back in 1916. He had started with the Pittston club of the Eastern Pennsylvania league in 1915, and, acting on this from Pennsylvania friends Thius Jennings, then manager of the Tigers, gave Bucky a trial. In a short time, however, he turned Harris over to the Scranton club of the New York State league.

Scranton promptly turned him over to the Mackay team of the Central league, where Bucky succeeded to play third base and bat at less than a .200 clip. The next season he started with the Norfolk club of the Virginia league, only to walk up one night in May morning to find the league had disbanded over night. He managed to hook up with the Reading club of the New York State league for the rest of the season and it was there that
