UNIVERSAL PEACE WITHOUT LOSS OF NATIONALISM SEEN BY LANUX

No loss of nationalism is necessary to effect a world peace. This is the belief of Pierre de Lanux, student of international affairs, who is in his talk on "Modern Nationalism in Foreign Policy" which he gave before the Paris, International politics class at their meeting last Thursday evening in the Royal Oak high school auditorium. This is the third meeting of the class in world politics which meet alternately in Birmingham and Royal Oak.

M. Lanux is well versed in international affairs and during the Paris Peace conference he was a member of the staff of Andre Tardieu. In 1924 he became director of the Paris, International office of the League of Nations. "There is a will for peace in the world today," he continued. "The work for the abolition of war is in progress. The masses are interested in peace, though often vaguely. But we need a definite peace treaty shown among nations by new treaties renouncing the right to go to war as a right. And we have a means of making it effective their desire to settle disputes peacefully. The League of Nations, the World Court and arbitration are forms of machinery not readily understood by the masses. Another reason why war is opposed is that the material interests of the world are on the side of peace. The munition makers are not the whole of industry. Ninety per cent of the big interests are toward peace. War means destruction that every one is afraid of. It impoverishes, even neutral."

M. DeLanux showed how the League of Nations structure of today has been developed in the years since the World War, as the nations of Europe, especially Canada, to realize how dependent each was upon the others. The League does not create opinion, he said. It gives it a chance to work. The greatest accomplishment of the League, he believes, is the publicity it gives to international affairs. The disputes and disagreements of nations are taken before the League in view of the world and each is made to feel the responsibility of the resulting effect of the world's public opinion makes it almost impossible for a nation to be selfishly aggressive in its policies. Some of the best newspaper men of the world are now writing for the League meetings and keep the world informed.

Some of the answers to questions put by the audience were: The idea of a world police force under the jurisdiction of the League has gradually been given up. It is apparent that such a force would either be too large for ordinary demands or too small for a big crisis. It is possible to depend on the League's own tactics as technical assistants to investigate crisis and report the facts to the league. Minorities of one nationality, included in the boundaries of another, are the ones in the map, have the right to put their cases before the league, and often do so. This helps protect the minorities from oppression and the nations from uprisings often fomented by selfish troublemakers.

The entrance of the United States into the League would be welcome, but is not now considered as absolutely necessary as it once was. The League wants the cooperation of this country in the solution of many of its problems. Its members understand the United States is in a different situation from Europe and that its final decision will be made slowly.

There is nothing in the covenant of the League to require any nation to enforce the decisions of the League. This was greatly feared by many of the American states opposing entrance of this country into the League. The council may recommend that
