STUDENTS READ TOO SLOWLY, U. OF M. PROFESSOR DECLARES

That a majority of students in the University of Michigan are not cultivating sufficient speed in reading and are thereby wasting 17 minutes of each hour devoted to reading is proved by the results of an experiment conducted by Dr. H. M. McCluskey, of the School of Education and members of his laboratory class in Psychology of Education. Students, on the whole, are found to pore over their books and to plod slowly and methodically through them making mere drudgery of their studying, while, according to this experiment they could read more rapidly and intelligently and thereby obtain better results.

The experiment which was given to the members of Dr. McCluskey's class consisted of four selections of reading material of equal difficulty. Each selection had an additional set of 30 questions. The students were directed to read the four selections at four different rates of speed—the first slow, the second normal, the third fast and the fourth very rapidly—and to understand them as well as they could. The speed of the reading of each student was taken and the adjoining questions were answered in order to determine the individual comprehension scores.

The average score which was computed from the reports of all of the students who took the test showed some very striking facts, both in relation to the individuals and the class as a whole. It was found that slow reading is a hindrance rather than a help to the average student, for when he reads at the rate of two and five-tenths words a second he only had an average of 21 correct answers out of 30. Likewise the result of skimming or the very rapid reading was that the accuracy or comprehension rate suffered, for the number of questions answered correctly were only 19, which is a low percentage of 63 per cent. The normal rate of reading for the average student in the class was found to be three and five-tenths words a second, and his comprehension per cent at this rate of speed was 82 1/2 per cent.

Professor McCluskey explains these singular statistics by stating that the majority of students are reading at a rate way below their limit of capacity, and advised most of them to speed up a bit and become more efficient. He pointed out that not only could the students gain time for more studying, but they could economize on it, so that they would have more time for pleasure. He further states that it would certainly pay most of the students in the university to test themselves as to their reading capacity and then to keep up to the rate at which they find they are able to get the best results.

From this average score Professor McCluskey has been able to make the further statement that if every student in the historic library for one week might lose this average 17 minutes an hour, the group as a whole would waste 136 hours, which is equivalent to 5 days and 16 hours. This is just a little more than one of our school weeks.

Soft water keeps clothes white

Hard water always leaves clothes gray, no matter how much you wash and rinse. Hard water has something in it with which the soap combines. Scum forms at once. This scum gets into clothes. You never can rinse it all out.

Soften hard water with Melo and you have a very fine cleaner, with or without soap. Scum doesn't form in this water. Clothes washed in it are as white as snow. Melo gives soap more effect on clothes. Get a can of Melo today at your grocery's.
