ABOUT SMOKE

Note: This is the third of a series of articles on smoke prevention by Mr. McCabe, chief smoke inspector of Detroit, who was recently employed by the village to relieve the smoke menace.

By Charles J. McCabe

It is interesting to note that in the burning of fuels there are chemical reactions take place that cause useful heat to be produced. If we analyze the common bituminous coal we will find that it is composed mainly of carbon, volatile matter and sulphur.

In order to burn coal it is necessary that air be supplied to it. Air is composed of oxygen and nitrogen with small percentages of other ingredients.

When the oxygen contained in the air enters the furnace, it mixes with gas that is being evolved from the coal. This gas, which represents the volatile matter of the coal, contains hydrogen and carbon. There is a union of the carbon of the coal, and the oxygen of the air that produces heat. The heat that is generated is dependent upon the presence of: (1) an adequate supply of air in the furnace, (2) thoroughness of the mixing of the air and furnace gases, (3) the maintaining of them at a temperature at which they will ignite.

Burning or combustion is said to be complete when the combustible of the coal unites with the greatest possible amount of oxygen. It is seen from this that either an oversupply of air or an under supply will cause heat to be lost. If too much air is allowed through the fire, the proper action will not take place because the excess air will lower the temperature of the furnace and act as a diluent, and carry away some useful heat with it in its passage through the furnace. In the case of an undersupply of air, the furnace gases will be deprived of means to enable them to react to cause the formation of heat. This might be compared with a smothering action.

The fact that air enters the furnace does not mean that satisfactory combustion will take place. There is a tendency of the furnace gases to stratify, that is, to form in layers of gas with the air. This does not promote complete burning. A turbulence and mixing must be effected to insure intimate mixing of the gas and air before combustion will be complete.

All the furnace gases have ignition temperatures and the mixture must be brought up from the temperature of the boiler room to the ignition temperature of the gases and kept there, before burning will be complete.

The nitrogen in the air mixture does not combine with the carbon of the coal at the temperatures ordinarily found in boiler furnaces. It is present without adding to the heat produced by the burning of the coal and in passing through the furnace carries away part of the heat generated. It acts as a heat carrier rather than a heat producer. If nitrogen were not present in the air it would be possible to build smokeless furnaces with much smaller volumes, thereby saving a great deal in material and construction costs.
