The WORLD and All by CHARLES B. DRISCOLL

OUR INGENUOUS AGE. Some gentlemen from Alabama... with published interviews... deplored the trends of these times with a rather convincing line of conversation. He was said about our coming cruiser fleet, and disillusioned because it seemed that anti-war treaties really amount to nothing. He cited the circumstance that where men formerly were brave, they are now ingenuous. Where they once went forth in hosts to kill one another in hand-to-hand combat, they now sit in laboratories and devise cunning instruments to do the killing.

It's all right to be disillusioned. But you shouldn't take your disillusionment any more seriously than your illusions. Don't let either illusions or disillusion get a strange hold on you. It's true that disarmament treaties don't mean much. They mean a lot of publicity for the statesman who happens to be training and unframing them at the moment. They mean careers for a few ambitious politicians. But about stopping war, of course we're all too grown up to imagine that they do.

But what of it? Let's not worry about the treaties. If you don't take the illusion of training and peace on earth that is just around the corner too seriously, you won't have much of a headache when you find that nations go on building fighting machines after signing treaties. That's just the kind of world we live in, and not a bad world at that.

Now, as to bravery that has passed and ingenuity that has taken its place. I can't see for the life of me how ingenuity is any less noble than bravery. In fact, I think ingenuity and inventiveness are much more civilized than bravery that seeks its justification in the cannon's mouth. A civilized person looks out for his skin. He not only keeps it from chapping by using a widely advertised cold cream, but he keeps it whole by sidestepping shooting matches and sword-plays. He sits in his studio and thinks up better ways to live his life and keep on living. He uses remote control in carrying on his battles. Far more civilized than the brave barbarian who was always wanting to know somebody's head off with a large oaken club.
